To the question whether a victory for Japan in the present war, would make for the advance of civilization in the Far East, Mr. Takahira replied that he sincerely believed that it would. "It would be manifestly improper for me," continued he, "to draw comparisons between Japan and her adversary, in the struggle now being waged. But I may without impropriety call attention to one salient fact, now a matter of record. In the negotiations which preceded the war, one of the principal agreements to which Japan asked Russia's adhesion, was a mutual engagement to maintain the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations in China and Korea. Equal opportunity, when used in this sense, can mean but one thing, the right of all civilized nations to participate in the development of the great resources of the Chinese and Korean Empires. It is the principle of liberty and of progress, as opposed to the doctrine of restriction and monopoly. A great deal has been said in recent years about the impending partition of China, and the creation of spheres of influence within which different Powers shall exercise exclusive control. It was against this result that the wise diplomacy of the United States was directed in the negotiations which followed the conclusion of the Boxer troubles. It was to this result, and no other, that Russia's action was tending in the efforts she made to gain control of Manchuria. For if Russia had been successful, who can suppose that other nations would have refrained from the attempt, at least, to secure exclusive domination of other parts of China? The recognition of the principle of equal opportunity eliminates all fear of the disastrous consequences which would inevitably follow such a struggle for supremacy. And the recognition of that principle in commerce and industry would naturally have been followed by its recognition in other directions. With the closer contact with civilized nations which equal opportunity for the development of commercial and industrial interests created, there would have come increased opportunity for the introduction and spread of other and higher civilizing influences.

"I am aware," continued Minister Takahira, "that in some quarters an ambition to control China and dominate her development is ascribed to Japan, and that in consequence, Japan's victory is said to portend the so-called 'Yellow Peril.' I do not think that I am employing too strong a term when I call this surmise, or apprehension, fanciful and absurd. No one knows better than we that other nations are as deeply interested in China's development and progress as Japan, and that it would be a practical impossibility, even if we entertained the ambition, to gain such an ascendancy in Chinese affairs as would imperil the welfare or the interests of other nations. For many reasons such an attempt would be doomed to certain failure. Not least of all, the national characteristics and tendencies of the Chinese themselves would impose an insuperable bar to the ascendancy of any nation which sought to mould China's millions into a compact military organization, to be employed at will against the rest of the world. The Chinese are not a military people in any sense of the word. As has been often pointed out, they are a race of people in whose minds centuries of training in a system of ethics incalculating its prinof her influence be widened, Minister Takahira said, "One of the first acts of our Emperor after the Restoration was the promulgation of an edict abolishing the laws against foreign religions and their propagation among the people. With the removal of ancient restrictions, an era of religious freedom dawned in Japan, and from that time the teaching of the doctrines of Christianity spread throughout the Empire. Now liberty of conscience and freedom of religious practice are firmly assured, not alone by public sentiment, but also by an express stipulation of the Constitution adopted in 1889. The authorized Commentary upon the Constitution—the official explanation of its various stipulations, which was published coincidentally with the instrument itself—says, regarding this article, 'Freedom of conscience concerns the inner part of man, and lies beyond the sphere of influence by the State. To force upon a nation a particular form of belief by the establishment of a State Religion, is injurious to the natural intellectual development of the people and prejudicial to the progress of science. No country possesses, by reason of its political authority, the right or the capacity to an oppressive measure touching abstract questions of religious faith.'

"The principle thus enunciated," continued Minister Takahira, "would undoubtedly control the sentiments and the action of the Japanese Government and people in any contingency and under all circumstances. A prominent Japanese official, commenting upon the attitude of the Japanese people toward Christianity, said that while others might not term Japan a Christian nation, her people had omitted no effort to assimilate the substance of that civilization, in the formation of which Christianity had taken a leading part. They cherish no form of bigoted religious belief, which, by inculcating intolerance and a fancied superiority over others, smothers inquiry and aspiration, but, so far as the law and unrestricted liberty of religious belief can accomplish it, their minds are open to all influences that can rightfully appeal to the conscience of man. From this it logically follows that the same liberty allowed to the Japanese people in this regard, will always be accorded to everyone over whom Japan has any right to exercise control.

"The danger of an increase of the martial spirit in Japan," said Minister Takahira, in response to another question, "is another of those hypothetical perils, on which stress has been laid. Those who dwell upon the possibility of such a danger wholly ignore every lesson taught by Japan's progress during the last three decades. Because she was successful in her war with China, and because she now fronts Russia in defence of rights, the maintenance of which is essential to her safety, it is taken for granted by those that her sole object is military aggrandizement. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The only martial spirit which exists in Japan is the spirit born of an ardent desire to defend the fatherland, and to conserve its lawful interests. When once these objects are accomplished, there is no more reason to suppose that the Japanese nation will be eager to enter upon a career of conquest than there is to imagine the same thing of the American people for example.

"The events following the Japan-China war compelled the government to adopt a policy of military and naval defence which the present events show to have been wise and prudent. It would have been to leave the nation defenceless, at the mercy of a powerful neighbor of uncertain designs and large ambitions. Even the expenditure which these preparations entailed was not allowed to interfere with the Empire's progress in other and more peaceful directions. The military and naval establishments were on a part, and by no means the principal part, of the general scheme of national development. Any one who believes that they will ever be fostered at the expense of plans for social, commercial and industrial development long planned and as vigorously carried out, entirely misapprehends the genius of Japanese progress. To the nation which enters upon a career of conquest, pure and simple, justly exists the distrust and dislike of other nations, and if persistent will undoubtedly in the end have to encounter their active opposition. But as the good-will and the favorable opinion of other nations are of the highest value to Japan, there is not the slightest danger that she will risk either for the sake of the illusory glories of military conquest. It is not ambition of this kind that has brought her into contact with Russia, but the endeavor to secure observance of principles which under her safety and the well-being and continued progress of her people.

"I think we have reason to hope," concluded Minister Takahira, "that our sincere efforts to avert war with Russia; reasonable and moderate representations which we made, and the patience we played throughout negotiations which were unduly protracted through no fault of our own, afford ample guarantee that Japan's future course, whatever it become, will be guided by the same moderation and the same strict regard for the rights and interests of others."

runs in two parallel streets—Waterport Street and Irish Town. The abrupt slopes at the back of the town are thickly covered with houses, built tier above tier, to a height of 250 feet above the sea. At the northern extremity of this district, is a Moorish castle, with its ancient walls riddled with shot marks, the honorable scars of siege. It is one of the oldest Moorish buildings in Spain, supposed to have been commenced by Tarik, but not completed until 725 by Abul Haziz, as the Arabic inscription over the south gate records. The most noticeable feature now remaining, is the Terre del Omenage, where the Moorish governors took the oath of allegiance—a massive tower, in a commanding place.

The galleries are the great sight of Gibraltar. There is no excavation in the world for military purposes, at all approaching them in conception or execution. They were begun to be excavated out of the solid rock during the siege, to bring a flanking fire to bear on the approaches.

about 27,000. Sir George White is the Governor of Gibraltar. He is the general who was Ladysmith, South Africa, when it was besieged by the Boers, and who held that place until he was relieved. No foreigner is allowed to stay on the Rock overnight without a permit from the chief of police. At night a gun is fired after which the gates are locked. If you are in the main street at this hour, you will hear a band playing a stirring tune, and the "sergeant," under special guard, following close behind, with the keys in his hand, taking the keys away to be locked up for safekeeping during the night. The gates are unlocked again at early gun-fire, and the city is then open to the people who live on the outside to come in.

Before this reaches you I will be again in Morocco, to resume my work there.

May God's richest blessing rest upon you and all the great family of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

The Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee

THE host of CHRISTIAN HERALD friends who are taking a sympathetic interest in the welfare of young women who may visit St. Louis without port this summer, are assured that the work of the Exposition Committee is being very urgently pushed forward. The Committee in New York is now thoroughly organized.

Those who have written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, receive copies of a circular sent out by the Committee, in which full information is given as to what should be done by women remote from the great commercial centres, as well as by those who reside in other towns and cities. It does not much matter where you may happen to reside. If there is not already conveniently near you, an Association which promotes the interests of young women, around which operations would naturally focus, you are invited to immediately take steps for the formation of a temporary organization of your own.

Until the announcement of a Secretary and summer headquarters can be made, I ask you to communicate directly with me. If you will send me the name of the lady at the head of your organization, I will personally see that you are supplied with as many of our Travelers' Aid identification cards as she may wish. Every young girl who is going alone to St. Louis, should carry with her a Travelers' Aid card, which will recommend her to the care and protection of the Y. V. C. A. in St. Louis. This card will be filled out with her name and address, and signed by the proper representative of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee. Its presentation, not only at St. Louis, but in case of need, at any station en route thither, will insure to the bearer, the advice and assistance of responsible persons, who will prove in every sense her friends. Young women going alone are urged not to seek advice by any way, from any persons except the railway officials—certainly not from fellow-passengers of either sex. The St. Louis Association has a list of homes into which girls may be received with safety, at reasonable rates for board and lodging, and it would be well for mothers sending their daughters to the Fair, to address a preliminary note to that Association, in advance.

Mrs. William Shaw Stewart, of Philadelphia, is chairman of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee. Among its supporters and members are Miss Grace H. Edger, Miss Helen Miller Gould, Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, Miss Sadie American, Mrs. C. N. Judson, Mrs. R. A. Dorman, Mrs. J. Ross Stevenson, and others. A public meeting, numerous attended, was held in New York on the afternoon of the 20th, in the parlors of the Y. M. C. A., in East Fifteenth street, Miss Grace Edger in the chair.

It is very desirable that drawing-room meetings in the interest of this work should be immediately held all over the country. These meetings may be very informal, and need involve little trouble to the one in whose house they are held, but they should give an opportunity to devise methods of raising sufficient money to assist those who, through no fault of their own, may find themselves penniless, far from home, having sought employment in vain. The work of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee will not be complicated with what is known as Rescue Work, neither will it be limited to young women of any special race or creed. It is broad in its design, and will be maintained along the line of simple beneficence. One generous New York woman proposes, at her own expense, to keep a Travelers' Aid agent this summer where she may meet incoming steamers, and render assistance to Norwegians, Danes and other Scandinavians, young girls from the Northern countries of Europe being particularly in her charge. Wherever a Travelers' Aid agent is found, she will wear a badge, showing who and what she is, and these agents will be admitted to steamboat landings and railway stations only by the express permission of the official management.

What seems to me an all-important matter is that there shall be speedily, an expression of sentiment amounting to a demonstration, indicating the intense desire of the American people, for a return to those days of the Republic, when it was our boast that our daughters could go anywhere, at any time, and be as absolutely safe on the road or in a strange place as in the homes where they were born.

Our Love of Our "Things"

By things I mean just things—chairs, tables, clocks, candlesticks, silver, and other properties of the home, endeared to us by use and long association. In a corner of the house, it may be, stands an old worn time-piece, not very much to look at, but prized beyond words, because hands that once wound it are dust in the grave, and when one hears it strike, one hears the sweet, faint echo of voices that are forever hushed on earth. Some of us cherish old cups and plates and would not part with them for any sum that might be offered, not that their intrinsic value is so great, but because they belonged to grandmother, or great-grandmother. When a sofa, or a chair, or a bookcase has been in a house while the children have grown up, it is somehow a part of their life as well as of their parents' lives, and is an essential of the home. Women cannot lose these precious bits of their environment without a poignant regret.

Fully insured, we sometimes hear it said, when fire has destroyed the accumulations of years, and the house and its treasures are reduced to gray ashes and blackened ruins. Yes, says the careless passer-by, the people in that house are fortunate. They are happily rid of a good deal of encumbering rubbish, and they may now furnish their home with new and beautiful appointments throughout.

Ask the house-mother her impression of the loss she has sustained. She will tell you that all the insurance in the world will not recompense her for the bureau, in the lowest drawer of which she kept the little white frocks and the little red shoes of the baby, who slipped out of her arms into heaven when she was a toddling child of two.

Ask the father, and he will bear out his wife's opinion, that he would rather have parted with anything on earth, than have failed to save the portrait of the darling daughter who faded out of this mortal sphere in the summer, when she had reached the loveliness of eighteen.

I never feel a greater pity than when the pathos of an auction sale, or a second-hand book-shop strikes in my soul, the chord that trembles to tears. Here, inscribed on the fly-leaf of a Bible, is the loving message of wife to husband, or mother to son. Here, knocked down to the highest bidder, is a picture or a lamp, once the pride of a home, purchased with the savings of many days. Yes, it is too true, that the fashion of this world passeth away. We should not set our hearts on anything of time. The things that are seen are temporal, the things that are unseen are eternal.

Her Knight-Errant

BY SARA VIRGINIA DU BOIS

SHE was a gentle, timid child, twelve years old, although you could scarcely credit it when you looked at her. Uncle Ed said he was sure they had made some mistake about her age, but mother declared she ought to know, with it recorded in black and white in the family Bible. And now she was to go to Louisville, alone, for a month's visit. They did not see how they could ever spare her, and certainly they would not have allowed her to have taken such a venturesome trip alone, had not the doctor strongly advised it. "She needs change of some sort," he said, "and if she does not get it, you will have a sick child on your hands, or I calculate incorrectly."

There was no question about it after that, Cora must go to Louisville as soon as the family could get her ready for the journey. Aunt Allie would be there awaiting her, and would take every possible care of her during her sojourn there. But what of the journey? The family purse was, at the best of times, slim enough; it was out of the question to think of any one accompanying her. "You mark my words, she'll be taken care of, Julia." This was from grandma, whose advice was always timely, and thankfully received. And Cora, with pale little face, flittered about from room to room, hovering continually between two opinions—a desire to go and a desire to stay at home. "I hope you will bear up proper well, child," said grandma. "It's for your good you are going, or you mind we would never consent to it."

And she did brace up well, even when the last tearful good-bye was said and the train started out from the depot.

There was but one vacant seat, the only one she could see, and the occupant was an elderly man, sitting next the window.

"May I sit by you, sir?" It was a timid voice that uttered the words. Poor little girl, she was so fearful lest she should cry.

"Certainly, my child, and welcome."

It was such a relief to sit under the care of this elderly man, that she lost a measure of her timidity and looked up at him gratefully.

"Oh, I am so glad," she said. "So glad of what, my little maid?" was the answer.

"That you will take care of me, sir, till I get there."

"Nothing could give me more pleasure than to take care of you; but where are you going?"

"To Aunt Allie's, at Louisville; and I am all alone."

"Not if I am your knight-errant. But suppose you tell me all about it."

And she did, in simple, childish language that appealed direct to the heart. It was when she pictured the dear ones she had left at home, that he brushed, unseen, tears from his eyes. Seemingly it was not many years since he, a boy, had parted from loving parents to try his fortune in the bustling outside world.

How quickly the hours sped by and how grateful she felt when she found her knight-errant was going to the end of the line. She would ask Aunt Allie what knight-errant meant. She was uncertain about it herself and did not want to expose her ignorance if she could avoid it. She nestled quite close to him with a sense of ownership, more particularly after he told her of a little granddaughter of his own, about her age. The conductor sought her out good naturedly at last. "I was instructed to look after you, little miss," he said, "and put you off at Louisville."

"Oh, thank you, but I shall not need you now; this is my knight-errant."

"All right," was the smiling answer; "I'll turn you over to him."

At Louisville, Aunt Allie was awaiting her. "Dearest child," she said, as she kissed her, "how did you get here? And were you much alarmed?"

"Oh, auntie," she cried, "didn't you see him, that beautiful old gentleman; he was my knight-errant."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

MADAME. No. It is awkward to take the arm of a guest, and walking around a room, to introduce her to every stranger in turn. Introduce your friend to those near you, as you receive her, and present her to others later.

EVE. Unless the circumstances are exceptional, you are not expected to make presents to your employer.

MARY. A course dinner in its simplest form consists of soup, roast, salad, and dessert, followed by black coffee. There may be grape fruit or oysters on the half-shell before the soup, and fish after it, before the roast, also various other dishes as entrees, but the four courses are the only necessities in the case.

God Seeking Men

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

"Put a ring on his hand"

The Confession

MY father being a man of wealth and position, my boyhood days were filled with privileges. Although my father's lands were broad, as I grew older I felt my situation in life circumscribed. I wanted to see the world. I knew that as a son I had a share in my father's estate, and so I went to him and said, "Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." He gave me my request, but I was yet to learn how literally it would send leanness into my soul. Gold heaped in bags and many changes of rich raiment he handed over to me. I was elated by this abundance, and loading all my treasure upon asses, I started away from home. I was too selfish to think of the pain that I was causing my father, though I did see there were tears in his eyes, and that his hand trembled when he laid it on my head and gave me his parting blessing. Oh how free I felt, and how narrow seemed the home I was leaving behind me.

I began at once to make friends. I see now that my riches were the bait which brought them to me; but this did not occur to me then. I thought of them as hail-fellows well met. How they did help me to spend my money! "Wine, women and song" afforded the pleasures which we sought together, and which I paid for. I wasted my substance in riotous living.

Illustration and Application

The parable of the prodigal son cannot be rightly understood, except by considering with it the whole sermon of which it is a part. Alone, it looks unevangelical, the sinner coming of himself to the Father, without a Mediator, and without any special aid of the Holy Spirit. But the whole sermon, including Luke 15 and 16, is probably the most complete expression in the Bible of the plan of salvation. The Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, the Church, the sinner lost and redeemed, are all pictured in a beautiful series of parables as five co-workers in salvation. The parable of the prodigal gives us a picture of the divine Father that is everywhere instinctively received as true to life. "When he was a great way off, his father saw him." But it needs to be closely joined with the parable of the lost sheep showing the Shepherd Saviour, the Son of God, going with bleeding feet from the safe fold of heaven, "away on the mountains wild and bare," to seek and save that which was lost. Then the parable of the lost coin brings in the Holy Spirit in the lamp, with which the woman, representing the Church, seeks the lost coin, stamped with the name and image of the King. This, as well as the lost sheep and the lost son, representing the lost soul, which the parable of the prodigal shows, as the others do not, must have a share in his own salvation. Jesus bears the lost one, and yet he also walks on his own feet. Two of the most powerful touches in the parable of the prodigal, are the two places where his free will is shown. First, in its evil exercise, fleeing from the father; second, in its noblest exercise, fleeing to the father.

Let it should be thought that only the vicious prodigals are sinners, it is shown in the sixteenth chapter that miserly moralists are sinners also, destined for destruction if they do not repent and learn the nobler uses of property. Dives, no less than the prodigal, has wandered far from God, and should return.

He divided unto them his living. The heavenly Father and earthly parents alike, must give beings of free agency their will on many occasions when it will bring them trouble, as the only plan by which they can learn the folly of having their own way.

In a certain home the wills of mother and son had come into serious collision. The good Christian mother was right, and the headstrong son, passing from youth into young manhood, was wrong, though he really thought his mother both unkind and unjust. "You say you want me to be happy," he said. "That you would gladly make any sacrifice to secure my happiness, and yet you refuse to do the only thing that can promote it. You will excuse me if I fail to understand such love." These were cruel words, and bitterly wounding to the unselfish soul whose affections were centered entirely in her children. "My obligation to do right, my son, far outweighs any other consideration," the mother replied sadly, but firmly. "That shows exactly how much you care for me," said the misguided boy, pale with passion. "And, as I do not care about keeping up relations with one whose love is simply pretension, I will relieve you of my society in future." "Very well," was the calm response. "But remember this, whenever you need me, my son, you will find me waiting to receive you." And now the door slammed heavily, and the mother's darling went on his obstinate way. There was nothing to do but to let him go, until he discovered by his own experience that she was right, and he was wrong. After bitter years in the school of experience, he came back in sorrow and need to the prodigal's ever-loving mother. Strange that so many insist on learning this bitter lesson for themselves.

It is fitting to insert here what is so likely to be overlooked in teaching this parable, that repentance does not undo all the consequences of evil-doing. One who has fired a bomb-shell may repent, but it will not stay the missile in its deadly flight. And a word is often more deadly than a shell, and once spoken is often as hard to recall. Jacob and David were both forgiven, but both suffered to the end the consequences of their sins. The prodigal will come back, but with only a charity ring and robe in place of his lost estate. Forgiveness will cancel the guilt, but not the bitter consequences of sin.

He came to himself. Dr. Joseph Parker, in a vivid sermon on the prodigal, described how "when he had spent all," he pawned his clothes. Throwing back his own outer garment he told how the desperate prodigal pulled off his coat and of the prodigal begging in vain for enough to eat even of the husks, another cried, "That's like us all. We're all beggars and might be better than we are." The reader went on until he reached the words, "I will arise and go unto my father," on which he fairly broke down. All were greatly moved. This young man sought the advice of the Christian merchant, and as a result the long-lost and dearly-loved prodigal was restored to both his earthly and his heavenly Father.

And when he was yet a great way off. An aged widow sat alone, having buried five of her six children, and "another, in a deeper sense, by her wayward departure before for parts unknown. Her grief for the buried was less than for this one, dead to virtue and affection. At snowy night someone came almost silently and stood behind her chair. She turned, and saw what was hardly more than the ghost of her once-beautiful daughter, pleading pardon for the past. The mother fell on her knees and thanked God, first of all, for bringing back the wanderer, and then she prayed with and for her daughter. When reconciliation was complete, the daughter asked why the mother had left the door unbarred when she was quite alone.

"My child!" the widow said, and smiled,—"a smile of love and pity. I kept it so, lest you should come, and turn away again. I've waited for you all the while—a mother's love is true; Yet it is the shadowy type of His, who died for you."

"Yes, there is One who will not chide and scoff, But beckons us to home of heavenly bliss; Beholds the prodigal a great way off, And flies to meet him with a father's kiss."

That will help us to understand that great saying of God "waiting to be gracious." His waiting never gives up. As it was said in the parable of the Good Shepherd, he searches for the lost sheep "until he finds it," so the Father waits for the wandering son until he returns, so should the Church search for the lost soul "until it is saved."

Father, I have sinned. A deaf and dumb girl, grey beloved by her father, sent far away for a year to be educated in an institution. She was taught to articulate, and at the end of the year when the father came, she ran to meet him, and opened her lips to say, "Father," but was so overcome with joy and surprise that he fell upon the walk. Such is the joy of heaven when the spiritual deaf and dumb, who will neither hear the voice of God nor speak to him in return, learn to say, "Father, I have sinned." A mother who has been left unprovided for the death of her bankrupt husband, with a large family of children, was soon deserted by the only son who was old enough to aid her.

keeping up the home. The mother would walk her room at night, especially on a stormy night, sobbing and praying for her wandering boy. So it went on for fourteen years, which she did not even know where in the wide world he was, or whether he was in this world at all. One summer night, when the mother was sitting with two of her grown sons on her porch, a tall, dark-bearded stranger stood in hesitatingly at the open window. The mother did not know him at first, but the big tears rolling down his face soon revealed him. She sprang up and bade him come in. "No, mother, I shall never cross your threshold. You tell me that you forgive everything." "Why, dear, I forgive you long ago; and now there's nothing to forgive save that you have stayed away so long." "As one who has his mother comforted," so our merciful Father welcomes back from our wanderings.

There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. That is the profoundest word of the whole story. President Mark Hopkins said in his last hour, "If there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth then in heaven they know what is taking place here. All they know not only the external, but the internal life of the world, because repentance is an inward thing. So I can go on to show that one system pervades heaven and earth. If there is joy over a sinner restored, they know it is a great thing to be saved. A few years ago, when ten men supposed to be killed in a Welsh colliery, were brought up alive after ten days' hard rescue work, there was rejoicing all over the British Isles, and the news was cabled to gladden faraway lands. So heaven rejoices when a soul is saved."

"HE SENT HIM INTO HIS FIELDS TO FEED SWINE"

drank its value. Then he sold his vest, and drank the proceeds. Later he sold his shirt, and drank what it brought. Then—and the doctor tapped his breast as though he had come to his naked body and there was nothing more to strip off and sell—then he came to himself. It was indeed a return from madness, a coming face to face with the nobler self in the chambers of conscience. He saw how he had fallen below his true self, his nobler ideals, his early teachings. What he was, confronted what he ought to be, and he was ashamed and aroused.

I will arise and go unto my father. In an English watering place there gathered in front of a tradesman's window, which included Bibles as part of the stock, a grotesque troupe of blackened minstrels, and after they had sung awhile, one young man, who looked to be above the others in quality, and had manifestly fallen from a better condition, "passed round the hat." The Christian shopkeeper said to him: "See here, young man, I will give you a shilling, and this book besides, if you will read a portion of the book among your comrades and the bystanders." "Here's a shilling for an easy job," he chuckled to his comrades, and taking the Bible, opened for him to the 15th of Luke, began to read, as directed, at the 11th verse, the story of the prodigal. At once the reader grew strangely serious, which caused a profound silence in the audience. When the reader spoke of the wayward son spending his substance in riotous living, one of his comrades ejaculated, "That's thee, Jim; it's just like what you told me of yourself and your father." The reader said nothing, but read on with even more feeling than before. When he read, "he began to be in want," again his comrade interrupted to say, "Why, that's thee again, Jim." As he read

The War in the Far East

CABLE dispatches from Chefoo and other points in the Far East, would seem to indicate that the conflict on land between the Japanese and Russian armies has already begun. On April 20, a strong fleet of Japanese warships, conveying some thirty transports, appeared in the Bay of Corea, steaming in the direction of Takushan. On the same day, another fleet was reported off Son-Chon, and a third (of seventy transports) was said to be heading for Kin-Chow, north of Port Arthur. It was believed probable that a landing would be attempted at some point near the Gulf of Ching-Thai-Fsu, which is not far away from Takushan, twenty miles to the west, and connects by caravan road with Port Arthur, 150 miles away, and with Feng-Huan-Cheng, fifty miles to the northeast, where the Russian forces are expected to make their first stand in force. It is believed that the Japanese will also advance from Wiju soon. Their arrangements for a turning movement are complete, and such a movement may begin at Takushan, as Feng-Huan-Cheng lies at the angle of an equilateral triangle, with Takushan and the Yalu as bases. The Japanese disembarkation will be so strongly covered by warships that the Russians will be powerless to prevent it.

It is apparently the programme of the Japanese to move simultaneously, in force, on the Yalu and at one or more points on the Liao-tung peninsula, cutting off a portion of the peninsula and effectually isolating Port Arthur. Gen. Kouropatkin is said to be carrying out a counter-movement on the east coast of Corea, throwing a strong Russian force into Corea along the great south road through the province of Hamgyung, with the intention of drawing a Japanese attack from the Yalu. Russian outposts on the Yalu on April 18 were almost in contact with the Japanese outposts. The Russians, in force, were holding the mountain passes between Manchuria and Corea, and were fortifying them with mountain batteries.

There is a report, that on April 12 an attempted Japanese landing under the protection of Admiral Togo's fleet, was made at Morea Bay, between Port Arthur and the Yalu, and frustrated by the hot fire of the land batteries at Takushan, where the Russians have concentrated 20,000 troops with artillery; 12,000 Japanese had landed before the attack began. No details of this action have been received. There is a rigid censorship on all correspondence and telegrams from the Russian side, and no news comes from the Japanese warships until after it has been officially communicated to the government at Tokio.

New Chwang, according to a St. Petersburg cablegram, was bombarded on April 21, and the Japanese landed troops there. This force will cross the peninsula and unite with those landed recently near the Yalu.

Seoul has rumors of a big battle on the Yalu and also of the fall of Port Arthur. It is now generally admitted that the Russian battleship Petrovsk was destroyed by a mine of a new type, designed by Captain Oda, of the Korio Maru, the Japanese vessel which laid the mines in front of Port Arthur on the night of April 12. The explosive used was invented by Prof. Shimose, and is said to be more powerful than lyddite.

Russia has rescinded the order directing that wireless telegraph correspondents be treated as spies.

Two submarine torpedo boats, bought by Russia in Germany, have been sent to the front.

Many of the refugees from Port Arthur, being unable to get transportation, have perished from cold and hunger.

Sharp fighting is reported at several points on the Yalu River. There is no reliable news on the subject, and the rumors come chiefly from native Korean or Chinese sources.

Russian troops, several thousand strong, are reported near the Tumen River, and advancing gradually southward. Puechan, eighty miles south of Gensan, has been occupied by the Russians. The Japanese garrison at Gensan has been reinforced.

General Kashlinsky, of the Cossack brigade, on April 19, reported to General

Kouropatkin, that the Japanese were entrenching along the Yalu, and opposite Golutsy, and north of that place. Their numbers were increasing, and spreading northward from Wiju to the river.

A Chefoo dispatch to the London Express says: "It is believed the Russians are gathering strength to invade Corea in force to offset the Japanese successes at sea. The Russian strength centred at Liaoyang is said to be almost overwhelming, and having the advantage of position it would be comparatively easy for the Russians to cross the Yalu."

The Tokio correspondent of the Times, confirms the statements of other correspondents that it is expected that the Russians will make a stand at the Yalu River. In addition to their 50,000 troops massed between Chiulencheng and Tatungku, their upstream extension is indefinite, but reaches at least to the Poshil River, which enters the Yalu opposite Huangpien.

Viceroy Alexieff has resigned, but up to April 21 there was no announcement that his resignation had been accepted. He is said to be greatly mortified over the appointment of Admiral Skrydloff at Port Arthur, he having recommended to the Czar the appointment of Admiral Dubassoff.

The Russian Baltic Sea fleet, by Admiral Skrydloff's desire, will soon proceed to the East. He hopes to unite the three Russian fleets.

The people of Vladivostok are suffering greatly from lack of food. The civil population is now reduced to 5,000.

A Nagasaki dispatch credits a leading Japanese statesman with the assurance that "Japan does not mean to humiliate Russia; but will destroy the fleets, capture Port Arthur and Vladivostok, and then, having removed the menace of Russia's power in the Far East, Japan will be prepared to listen to proposals of peace." This would indicate that Japan has no idea of carrying on an extensive campaign in Manchuria.

Macedonians Grateful

Rev. Leroy F. Ostrander, of Samokov, Bulgaria, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, giving some interesting details of the conclusion of the relief work among the Macedonians, which was made possible by the funds contributed by our readers. He adds: "Thanking you and the readers of your paper, both personally and in the name of the distressed Macedonians, for the Christian generosity which has helped us to do something to relieve the suffering around us." Letters containing similar assurances of the profound gratitude of the Macedonians have also been received from other missionaries and also from a number of native pastors. It is expected that the distributors will shortly make report of their work in detail.

All That Was Left of It

At a gathering of several ministers recently (says the Baltimore Sun), one of them, who is opposed to the so-called "higher criticism," told the following: "One day a member of a certain church, who had listened attentively for five years to the preaching of his pastor, took to the Divine his Bible, which was truly a sight to behold, with whole books clipped out here, or a passage gone there. Indeed, between the covers, there was little else left but a few shreds of paper. The pastor was horrified, and rebuked his parishioner for using the Bible so shockingly. The parishioner meekly replied:

"It is all the result of your preaching. When I went home from church each Sunday, I cut out of the book that which you had criticised in your sermon of that day. That verse on the Trinity was an interpolation; so out went the strong verse. Then the canonicity of this book and that was doubtful; so out went this book, and that. John did not write the Gospel of John; so out went what was called the Gospel of John. This bit of history was not history, only allegory; so out went that false and deceiving thing. Positively, sir, I have been faithful with my shears, and this is all the Bible I have left—the two covers and a few tatters."

SUNSHINE NOTES

Philip M. M. Lennan, of Middle River, Nova Scotia, is an invalid confined to his chair. He feels lonely, and it has been arranged that he receive a surprise letter party on May 10. Send him a friendly note, with just a little card of greeting, or poem of "good cheer." This will brighten many dark days for him.

Sunshine member in Boston started the good work, by providing the rent for several months.

If a friend's kindly words give you pleasure,
Just pass the bright saying along;
Its value and cheer you can't measure—
A wail, it may change into song.

Don't be selfish, and keep all the sunshine
A good deed may have brought unto you;
Divide it with others and let it refine
All the brightness which falls to your due.

Mr. N. L. G. Anderson, Ottobine, Va. (an invalid), would appreciate magazines. Some readers may be disposed to send him a few.

Mrs. J. H. Bailey, of Rough Creek, Va., has a family of little children, and it is sometimes very hard to clothe them. Her boys are thirteen, eleven and ten years old, and her husband is a semi-invalid. She is anxious to have clothing for some of the boys, so that they may go to school.

Some Sunshiner may be disposed to send to Lem F. Joyce, of Sandy Ridge, Stokes Co., N. C., a little boy of eleven, a few books to read. Mrs. Maggie Ferguson, of Sandy Ridge, N. C., would be grateful for silk pieces for quilts.

Answered Prayers

Miss D. H., Portsmouth, Va. "I promised that if my prayer was answered, I would make public acknowledgment. I have had direct answers to many of my prayers. The Lord will always help when we ask and trust him."

Mrs. H. J. B., Newark, N. J. "I wish to acknowledge publicly God's goodness in answering prayer. The Lord hath done all things well, whereof I am glad."

J. D., (A Believer), Frackville, Pa. "God has answered my prayers many times."

A Reader, Kansas. "I earnestly prayed to God for deliverance from trouble, and my prayer was answered."

M. B. T., Nogales, Ariz. "Dark clouds hung over us, but in answer to our prayers His sunshine has taken their place. We cannot doubt that God answers prayer."

E. P. W., Urbana, Ill. "My prayers have been answered, and I am now happy. I have faith, and will still ask God's blessing."

Old Subscriber, Kansas City, Mo. "I wish to tell of the direct answer to prayer, in what seemed to be a human impossibility, in reclaiming a dear one. Blessed are all they who trust in Him."

B. G. H., St. Louis, Mo. "I want to testify to the goodness of the Lord in answering my prayer, and giving me the desire and longing of my heart. Bless the Lord, oh my soul!"

Believer in Prayer, New York. "I have a burden which is heavy to bear, and recently seemed almost intolerable. I carried it to the Lord, cast it upon him, and prayed, not that he would remove it, but that he would sustain me according to his promise. His grace has made it wondrously lighter, for he has given me strength to bear it more cheerfully."

Old Subscriber, Pittstown, N. J. "I had a heavy cross placed upon me. I prayed to God to remove it, and he has answered my prayer. He has not only answered this prayer, but many others."

W. E., Childersburg, Ala. "In gratitude to our Heavenly Father for many answered prayers, I desire to add my testimony to that of others, to my lost condition, without any outside influence whatever being brought to bear on me. Let no one doubt his mercy and power."

E. S. H. "God hears and answers prayers, I know, if we call upon him in earnestness of heart. He helped me not only once, but many times."

M. A. K., wishes to add her testimony to the faithfulness of God in hearing and answering prayer.

A Constant Reader, Mechanicsville. "God has answered my prayers in such a direct way that I feel I must acknowledge it. He is a true friend to sinner as well as Christian, if they will only pray to him."

Mrs. A. C. M., Milwaukee, Wis. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering my prayers. If we pray in faith, I know he will hear us."

A Mother, Missouri. "What a privilege to carry everything to God in prayer! I believe in a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God."

Mrs. S. "God has answered my prayer. I had a wayward boy, who had left home; but I prayed to the Lord, and he brought him back, for which I praise him."

A. E. D., Milburn, N. J. "I promised God to acknowledge an answer to prayer, and I want to testify to the answering of many prayers."

R. and J. B., husband and wife. "We wish to acknowledge to the world that the Lord hears and answers prayers."

"When I drank coffee I often had sick headaches, nervousness and biliousness much of the time but about 2 years ago I went to visit a friend and got in the habit of drinking Postum.

"I have never touched coffee since and the result has been that I have been entirely freed of all my stomach and nervous trouble.

"My mother was just the same way, we all drink Postum now and have never had any other coffee in the house for 2 years and we are all well.

"A neighbor of mine, a great coffee drinker, was troubled with pains in her side for years and was an invalid. She was not able to do her work and could not even mend clothes or do anything at all where she would have to bend forward. If she tried to do a little hard work she would get such pains that she would have to lie down for the rest of the day.

"I persuaded her at last to stop drinking coffee and try Postum Food Coffee and she did so and she has used Postum ever since; the result has been that she can now do her work, can sit for a whole day and mend and can sew on the machine and she never feels the least bit of pain in her side, in fact she has got well and it shows coffee was the cause of the whole trouble.

"I could also tell you about several other neighbors who have been made over by quitting coffee and using Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE SPELL OF HOME

By David Lyall

OLD Malcolm MacVean, for forty long years village shoemaker in Inchonnen, in the Scottish Highlands, looked out by his cottage door in the morning, shading his eyes from the sun with his hand. It was a morning in late September, and the sun having shone with unprecedented constancy for well-nigh a month, the scant sheaves were dotting the fields everywhere. And there was rejoicing in the hearts and on the faces of the tillers of the soil. For once in the cycle of years Inchonnen had belied its reputation of being a wet, cold, dreary place, and the fruits of the earth could not ripen, but had to be gathered green and sodden from the fields year after year, and given to the fowls as winter fodder. Now this mystery and great wistfulness had often lain heavy on the soul of Malcolm MacVean, and he had brooded over it, even wrestling with the Almighty for the heaviness of the blight that seemed to lie on the strath he loved. But the forty years he was no nearer solution than he had been at the beginning, and was bound to fall back upon Holy Writ, "My way are not your ways, nor my thoughts your thoughts, saith the Lord."

Neither Malcolm, nor any of his grumbling neighbors ever gave a thought to the folly of trying to cultivate farms on land that was never meant for it, of sowing corn and planting potatoes on furrows that were half the garden water, when the burns ran in spate for the hills, and the morass about the loch was impassable even for the sheep. And the people, one by one dropped away, killed by the scourge which arose from these unhealthy conditions of life, they took no thought of the folly that had made a place of ruin habitation there at all. Who was first responsible for the birth of Inchonnen none could tell. Sure it was very old, nestling in the silent, close shadow of its encircling hills. The houses themselves, with their gables and overhanging eaves, would tell of old; and the ruined, empty, desolate cottages scattered here and there on the loch-side, and also further up on the slope of Ben-nechie could tell, too, that the place had fallen in days.

Malcolm MacVean was looking, that still, morning, shading his eyes as they passed the long winding trail of the white road. He had kept this vigil at the dawn of the high twenty years each morning with faithful access of faith and hope. Far down the road he could see a moving black speck, but as not unduly uplifted by the sight, for, like a mirage in the desert, it had deceived him often. He took out his big, old-fashioned watch, and saw that it was just five o'clock, a likely time for any respectable traveler to arrive on foot at a place so remote as Inchonnen. No doubt it was some "gangrel bod" or one of the tinkers women, with her load of tins on her back, who had fallen by the way with fatigue, and slept under the dry braens. He stepped back to the little kitchen, and hid some more peat on the fire, and swung the singing kettle back from the smoke; then taking his stout stick, set out for the road. He often took a walk in the morning, before the day's work claimed him, and no body seeing him, wondered or thought it strange. Already the thin line of smoke was rising from nearly every chimney; there were few sluggards in Inchonnen, or any ants to tame them with their industry.

As he left the village behind, and came out on the treeless road, the wind seemed to spring up freshly from the hills, to stir his glocks and fill his lungs with fresh vigor. Then he could see the flutter of skirts in the distance, and knew it was a woman approaching. Perhaps his heart beat a little fast—it might be the woman he wished to meet. That he had been disappointed so often, took nothing away from the freshness of his hope.

His foot quickened, hers seemed to lag; on she stood still, and even turned her head down the steep slope whence she had come. Then did Malcolm, with the sweat on his brow, break into a little run, in an agony lest she should escape. And all this before there was any possibility of recognition, only something told him the answer to his long pang had come at last. The ends of his plaid fluttered in the wind, he had his bonnet in his hand, and his stout stick under his arm so that he would not be impeded, and he came quite close to her, she standing still in the road, with her thin hands folded, a look which cannot be described upon her face.

It was a sad face, and weary—the face of one who had been down in the depths of life, and had tasted its bitterest cup. Yet she had left it a bonnie, fresh lass, with the bloom of the morning on her cheek, and the light of the sun in her eyes. It was not for her to speak. She was not clever, like the prodigal of old, to con a moving lesson beforehand; she had no words to pierce the heart of the father she had so grievously offended. But no words were needed. The silence about them made fitting environment for a moment of acute anguish.

It was the old man who first found his voice.

"Elspe, so ye are come hame."

There was a moving pathos in these bald words. Elspet MacVean shook as an aspen shivers in the wind.

"Ay, father," was all she said, and they looked at one another again in that strange, deep silence. It was deep enough and elastic enough to bridge the gulf of the intervening years. He was not learned in knowledge of the world from any experience of his own, but his daughter's story needed no telling. It was writ large upon her from top to toe. Her eyes had wept, her face had blanched and grown thin and weary through feeding on the husks; her poor clothing, though clean and decently whole, spoke the poverty that would not hide.

"Where haf ye been, bairn, a' the nicht?" he asked huskily.

"I started frae Blair last nicht, but it tired me, an' I had to creep into the bracken. I could hae walkit once, father—there an' back."

"Ay, but the bracken was dry, Elspet. It is nineteen year sin ye gaed doon the road to Blair. It has been a hard road."

"Yes, it has been a hard road; and what I'm come back for, I ken not."

"You micht haf written, Elspet. 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.'"

"I had naething to tell that ye wad wish to hear."

"Did he marry ye, lass?" he asked then, and his eyes seemed fathomless as they dwelt mercilessly upon her face.

She shook her head.

"He left me in three year. The bairn deed. I've been in service since. But there's something here," she said, pressing her hand to her side, "an' I couldna dee in the puirhouse."

"God forbid! Ye are welcome hame, Elspet. Ye hae paid the price."

It was his verdict which covered the whole dreary vista of the years he had waited. He had no reproach for the child who had so ill requited his fatherly care; he could leave that in other hands. What he was presently concerned with was her homecoming, and the "something here," Misery is ever selfish. Elspet MacVean had nothing to say regarding her father's looks. Had she been asked, she might have said that in twenty years he had changed but little. All the change was in her.

"What'll they say in Inchonnen, father? It will be ill for me, aye, an' for you, to hear their clashes."

"We can shut the door, my lass; an' nae man or woman will clash to Malcolm MacVean when he has no mind or ear to listen."

"I will shame ye, father, for I hae nothing in the wide world but what ye see. For I hae been ill near a year, an' even in the hospital, an' all my siller is dune."

"I haf enough," he made answer. "Come then, bairn, let us hame, for it is jist on the stroke o' six."

They quickened their steps a little, and presently with one accord began to cross a stubble field that brought them to their own door. Elspet MacVean was three whole days in her father's house before a soul knew of her return. Then it was the doctor that discovered it. He was riding past the cottage door when the old man signed to him to come in. And there at the fireside, wrapped in an old plaid, was a woman he had no difficulty in recognizing.

"So," he said, drawing a long breath, "you have come back, Elspet."

He regarded her steadily, and with a deepening gravity. He was a plain-spoken man, of no mean skill, who never beat about the bush. After a brief examination, he nodded first, and then shook his head. The old man followed him anxiously to the door.

"She'll not last long, Malcolm. It's a pity that she should have made such havoc of her life."

"Then she iss to dee? When, doctor?"

"In about six weeks or so the stress will come. I'll drop in as I pass by, Malcolm; but it is little I can do."

When the old man re-entered the cottage Elspet turned to him.

"He says I am to dee, father; but it winna be yet, not this year, nor the next, you can tell him that frae me."

"In the Lord's time, lass," said the old man rebukingly, but there was a mist before his eyes.

The next morning his broken sleep was disturbed by the swish of a heather besom on the floor, and the stir of much cleaning. And when he drew the curtain of the box bed, in which he shut himself nightly, in total defiance of all the laws of health, he saw that the place was empty of all its meagre furniture, and Elspet on the chair, with a pail of white-wash ready to her hand.

"Mercy me, lass, ye are beside yersel'!" he cried with a gasp.

"Lie still, or I bid ye get up; it's jist five."

GEMS FROM NEW BOYS

The Test of Originality

HUMAN beings are much the same to-day as when their characteristic traits proved so suggestive to Attic and to Roman orators. It needs but an alert, receptive mind to take these things and transform them into material for oratory. Ruskin took a common rock-crystal and saw hidden within its stolid heart lessons which have not yet ceased to move men's lives. Beecher stood for hours before the window of a jewelry store thinking out analogies between jewels and the souls of men. Gough saw in a single drop of water enough truth where-with to quench the thirst of five thousand souls. Thoreau sat so still in the shadowy woods that birds and insects came and opened up their secret lives to his eye. Most men are blind. There are a thousand times as many hidden truths and undiscovered facts about us to-day as have made discoverers famous—facts waiting for some one to "pluck out the heart of their mystery." But so long as men go about the search with eyes that see not, so long will these hidden pearls lie in their shells. Not an orator but who could more effectively point and feather his shafts were he to search nature rather than libraries. Too few can see "sermons in stones" and "books in the running brooks," because they are so used to seeing merely sermons in books and only stones in running brooks. Sir Philip Sidney had a saying, "Look in thy heart and write;" Massillon explained his astute knowledge of the human heart by saying, "I learned it by studying myself;" Byron says of John Locke that "all his knowledge of the human understanding was derived from studying his own mind." Since multiform nature is all about us, originality ought not to be so rare.

Original minds have learned to think consecutively. This is an age of second-hand thinking. We all ask for our milk malted, our meats peptonized, and our books digested. Reviews, condensations, and reference books are quite as typical of the intellectual life of the period as are labor-saving devices characteristic of the material world. Short cuts are the mania of the age.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler proposes five tests of education, in the broadest sense of the term, and among them he places reflection. Here they are:

1. Correctness and precision in the use of the mother tongue.
2. Those refined and gentle manners which are the expression of fixed habits of thought and of action.
3. The power and habit of reflection.
4. The power of intellectual growth.
5. Efficiency, the power to do.

But if the lack of consecutive thinking is such a general failing, all the greater are the rewards offered to the public speaker who to his powers of observation is willing to add the ability to reflect, and to think systematically. Originality waits for him to crown his desire with gift.

*From How to Attract and Hold an Audience, by J. B. Esenwein, a popular teacher on the preparation and delivery of public discourse, very practical and useful to students and speakers. Pp. 272, cloth. Price $1. Hinds & Noble, New York, publishers.

At six the wa's will be done, an' ye'll get your breakfast. It's the dirt o' twenty years," she added critically; "for what can a man body ken about a hoose?"

She spoke blithely, like one who had gotten a new lease of life. And she had. In some mysterious way, home had laid a healing spell on Elspet MacVean, and in the midst of her gladness she had no mind to lie down and die, as it was expected and predicted she would do.

The "something here" either disappeared, or remained in abeyance to her strong will—certain it never troubled her, and she lived to be a comfort to her father to the day of his death. Hers was a record of deeds rather than words. As for her neighbors, after they had gotten over the first shock of their surprise, and found what a different Elspet had returned from the one who had gone away, they bore her no grudge, nor did they cast her ill-doing in her teeth. Just as her soul, for the twenty years of her exile, had never ceased to be in blessed bondage to the memory of her father's righteous example, so now it bore rich fruit in a quiet life of service to God and man. The woman who had sinned and suffered, became in the place of her birth a succorer of many.—British Weekly.

Golden Milestones

Rev. George Hillman and wife celebrated their golden anniversary at their home, near Scotia, Neb., on Oct. 11, 1903. A large number of old friends gathered to tender congratulations. Many beautiful gifts attested the love and esteem in which these good people are held. Mrs. Hillman wore the dress she first wore as a lovely bride fifty years before, and two witnesses of the marriage were present.

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Hodgdon were married on Feb. 12, 1854. A large gathering of friends were present at the fiftieth anniversary of this event, at the home of the happy couple at Hoquiam, Wash., where they have resided.

Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Lee, of Somers, Conn., passed the golden milestone eleven years ago, having recently celebrated their sixty-first anniversary. They have been church members for nearly sixty-five years. Mr. Lee is eighty-four years of age, his wife one year younger. The old couple are in excellent health, retaining all their faculties in a very marked degree.

At their pleasant home in Pittston, Pa., Mr. and Mrs. John Barnes recently celebrated their golden wedding. An interesting feature of the occasion, was the renewal of the marriage vows made fifty years before, the groom presenting the bride with a new wedding-ring, the first one having been lost. The parlors and dining-room were artistically embellished with golden-rod and other flowers, while in the centre of the dining-table stood a vase filled with fifty golden daffodils.

The fiftieth anniversary of the wedding of Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Strickler, was celebrated recently in Keokuk, Ia. Mr. and Mrs. Strickler made the trip West soon after their marriage, when the methods of travel were quite different from what they are now. Up to the time of Mr. and Mrs. Strickler's removal to Keokuk, they owned and lived upon the land which they bought in Missouri so many years ago. They joined the Presbyterian Church early in life, and have been consistent members for over half a century.

NOT ON MEAT

Man Couldn't Regain Strength Until He Changed to Grape-Nuts.

It's a common joke to say "He eats so much it makes him poor to carry it around" when speaking of some thin, scrawny fellow who eats as much as a horse, but it is frequently true if the food is not the kind the body calls for.

A person might eat a ton of improper food and never get an ounce of nourishment from it but put them on a Grape-Nuts diet and four teaspoonfuls of this food (which is all nourishment) quickly brings pounds in weight and a fortune in health and strength. This has been proved over and over.

A German woman of Chicago gives an instance in her own family. It's briefly told but the truth is there: "My husband lost his left hand in an accident and lost a terrible amount of blood, kept getting weaker for five months and finally got a terrific cough. He would eat big meals of meat and potatoes to get well but didn't get any good from them. Finally I persuaded him to try Grape-Nuts food and from a skeleton of 83 pounds he soon regained his normal weight of 207 pounds and is strong and well and declares he wants no other food for the main part of his meals.

"As for myself my flesh was flabby, I tired so easily and my memory was so poor I could keep nothing in my head but after three months of the Grape-Nuts diet I gained 12 pounds, my flesh is hard and firm, I am stronger and my memory has improved wonderfully. I keep a candy store, but I sell Grape-Nuts, too, for I think it is the best thing to give the children." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

BROTHERLY RESPONSIBILITY

The Opportunity for the Exercise of Fraternal Influence

I DEAL brotherhood, the sweet, unselfish concern for the welfare of members of the same family—is too often crushed out of existence by the hard conditions of our present life. Who has not seen the hard resentment that sometimes is stirred by the reading of the father's will? Jealousy and envy rankle in one brother's heart against another and survive for years. The intensity of the desire for wealth is often stronger than the affection which we call "natural," though we have all read how sadly it was absent from the heart of the elder of the first pair of brothers. Cain seems to have permitted his jealousy to overcome every other feeling in his relation to his brother, and if he had natural affection, it exercised no restraining influence. But jealousy and envy are evil passions, which we instinctively feel are never so much out of place as when they exist between brothers. However we behave toward our brothers, the very use we make of the word implies sincere affection. It is significant of the better spirit that Christianity inculcates, that while brotherhood, in the opening pages of the Old Testament, was associated with hatred and murder, it was associated in the opening pages of the New Testament with service. Andrew first found his own brother Simon and brought him to Christ. This is a service that a brother has the best opportunity of rendering. The influence of brother over brother is in some aspects stronger even than that of a father. There is a bond of sympathy between young souls that the father loses as the years pass, and his son is apt to feel that the views of maturity do not apply to one who has life before him. His brother belongs to the same period as himself, and his example and advice have consequently a force of their own.

His mother's son. A touching story is related by Dr. J. B. Owen, of two brothers, one of whom had become rich by a system of hard bargaining, and the other had become needy, through a generous over-liberal disposition. They were both past middle life. The rich one a bachelor, and the poor one a widower, without children. They saw one another occasionally, for the poor brother was employed as private watchman in a block in which the rich brother had his offices, which he made his home. One bitter winter night, the rich brother had retired to rest, when he was awakened by a foot-step in his outer room. He lay trembling, for he felt sure it was a burglar, and he was too weak to hope to cope with him. He was relieved, a minute later, when he saw it was his brother, the watchman, with a lantern. "Brother John," said the watchman, "you left your door unlocked, and might be robbed." The brother was quickly out of bed, and gruffly uttering thanks, proceeded to fasten the door. As the watchman went out into the cold, he said, "Brother John, you don't have any small change to spare, do you?" There was no reply but the bolting of the door; but as the rich man lay awake afterwards, his brother's inquiry kept ringing in his ears. Perhaps it would be better for himself if he did have some small change in the shape of little kindnesses, that he could do. He could remember that brother, a bright, witty, generous boy, whose sayings were good enough for mother to tell again. He could see him going to school by his own side, and protecting and helping him in his boyhood days. Strange how things had changed, but he could see now that Charley was not the kind of boy to push his way on in life. He certainly was poor enough now. What if he did find some small change for him. He was missing from his familiar haunts the next day, and Charlie, the watchman, was missing, too, having resigned his office. A week or two later the boys in the street were surprised to see Brother John alight at his door, from a hack, and with him was Brother Charlie, in a new suit of clothes. They both went in together, and from that time Charlie never needed to ask anyone for small change.

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instant Restores Hearing in Even the Oldest Person—Comfortable, Invisible and Perfect Fitting.

190 Page Book Containing a History of the Discovery and Many Hundred Signed Testimonials from All Parts of the World—SENT FREE.

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to help me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable! I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance, deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient year study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as I do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I can in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from part of a large church or hall. My general health improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a relieved, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or other such old-fashioned make-shift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in respects. It is so small that no one can see it in position, yet it collects all the sound waves that focus themselves against the drum head, causing it to vibrate naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male, female, and aside from the fact that it does not abrade the ear, it never causes the least irritation, and can be worn with comfort day and night without removal for a cause.

With my device I can overcome deafness in a person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery or through accidents. My invention not only overcomes, but at once stops the progress of deafness, all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest audiologists in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest island. I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, school ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state many whose names you know, and I am sure that this will convince you that the remedy for deafness is at last being solved by my invention.

Don't delay; write for the free book to-day at address my firm—The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1862 Tower Building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

"That Boy"

HY does he always stub his toe
In climbing up the stair,
Throw down his hat,
Kick up the mat,
And never seem to care?
Because he is a boy!

HY does he bang and slam the doors
In going through the rooms,
While dropping flat
His base-ball bat,
And knock down all the brooms?
Because he is a boy!

HY does he carry worms for bait
In pockets of his coat,
While it's easy to trace
A map on his face,
From his forehead down to his throat?
Because he is a boy!

HY don't he want to go to bed
When his parents think it best,
But eyelids blink
And wink and wink,
As he toddles to his nest?
Because he is a boy!

HY does his mother love this lad,
And never mind his pranks,
His tousled hair
Or jacket's tear,
As she rubs his wounded shanks?
Because he is her boy!

HY does his father watch with pride
The sturdy little man,
And stoop to pat
That ragged hat,
And his features fondly scan?
Because he is his boy!

When time shall bring him manhood's crown,
Should he falter by the way,
May loving care
And patience rare
Be given him each day,
Because he is our boy!

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS.

A Prince Killed in Play

An accident has cost the life of one of the junior Princes of the German Imperial House—little Prince Henry, youngest son of the Emperor and Princess Henry of Prussia. The prince was playing at railroads with his elder brother, Prince Sigismund, and the boys had arranged a row of chairs to represent a railroad train. As Prince Henry jumped on a chair, it slipped from under him, and he fell heavily to the ground, striking his head against a sharp corner of the chair. Inflammation of the brain set in, and the child passed away after some weeks' illness. It is a curious coincidence that the Prince's mother—Queen of Hesse—lost a young brother from an accident, little Prince Frederick William of Hesse, who fell out of his mother's bedroom window. Prince Henry, who was only four years old, was great nephew to King Edward, and nephew to the German Emperor, as well as of his only surviving brother.

Avoid Speculation! Invest in Land!

EVERY reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD naturally avoids speculation. Invest your money in first class farming land in a new country. Place it where it is the safest and will return to you large profits. The Upper Peninsula of Michigan is rapidly filling up with settlers, land values are increasing, and land purchased of us for from $5 to $10 per acre, will be worth from $20 to $50 per acre in a few years. Our land is located close to good markets, towns, and railroads, and raises all farm products, including the finest strawberries, apples, and sugar beets. We are selling it to investors for $10 down, and $10 per month.

If you want to make a sound investment, if you want to own a good farm which you can sell at a good profit next year, write us for full particulars and look us up carefully. Write each one of the banks we give as references. Write us today.

Questions & Answers

Correspondents are asked to remember that we cannot examine poetry for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and that we cannot return such MSS. when unsolicited.

O. W. Should a person be retained in church membership who, against the advice and entreaties of friends both in and out of the church, erects a building on purpose for a saloon, and insists that there is no harm in it, and that it is just as legitimate a transaction as any other business?

It is a matter for serious consideration whether such a person is not to be classed along with the saloon-keeper, since he prefers, as a means of income, to rent his premises to the traffic which, as we have many times declared, is about the worst enemy the world has to contend with to-day. There are doubtless on the membership rolls of many churches the names of owners of such buildings, as well as the names of saloon-keepers; but such churches can find no excuse for temporizing with the traffic, or for accepting its favors, even in a remote sense. How any one can reconcile the making of money from this soul-and-body wrecking traffic, with the profession of Christianity, passes our comprehension.

V. W. W., North Topeka, Kan. What was the name of the ship that brought the first slaves to America?

Slavery was begun within U. S. territory in 1619, when a Dutch trading ship arrived (name not given), and sold twenty negroes to Virginia settlers. The first American slave-ship was the Desire, built at Marblehead in 1636.

L. D., Deer, Minn. What is meant by: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth" (Ex. 20: 4)?

It was a specific injunction against idolatry. The Egyptians and other ancient races worshiped as gods, images of birds, beasts, serpents, and fishes (as Dagon, the fish-god, of Philistia), fantastic and frightful representations of sphinxes, dragons, winged bulls, and strange, non-existent creatures, and even heaps of stones. To some, these were merely visible symbols, but the multitude of ignorant worshippers held them as things in themselves sacred and paid them the homage due to divinity. It was against this sin, so prevalent in those days, that the Mosaic law sternly warned the Israelites.

G. C., Maramec, Okla. I heard a preacher assert from the pulpit, not long ago, that "statistics do not prove that the world is getting better." What are the facts?

Such assertions are too vague to be of importance. Besides, statistics could be made to prove just the contrary, the result depending upon their thoroughness. There are more Christians in the world to-day than at any previous time; more humanitarian work; more brotherhood; a more widely diffused elevation of the moral standard; the Gospel is being preached in nearly every land under the sun, and is now printed in over 300 languages and dialects. It is true, we see more of the world's wickedness, because we have better facilities for knowing what is going on in all lands than were enjoyed by our forefathers. There never was an age when the efforts of God's people to help the poor, alleviate suffering, comfort sorrow, and to bring about the world's peace and happiness, were so widely disseminated as now.

H. B. K., Tioga, Pa. Where can a young man, with a limited amount of money, get a practical Bible training?

Write to Moody Training Institute, Chicago, Ill., or East Northfield, Mass.

Anxious. The expression in a recent question, "I would rather die than publicly tell the story" troubles me, for I felt the same, and thought it was pride that restrained the confession. I made about the same remark, and one said, "No one need know it but God," and I said, "But it will be known at the last day," and the reply was, "Oh, does your pride reach as far as that?" Finney and Moody said we must be willing to confess. Isn't it a pride that we must humble, in order to find peace of conscience, so that we do not seem better than we really are?

The subject of confession, auricular or public, is one that troubles many Christian hearts. There are unquestionably occasions when the person is greatly helped by open confession, and in some cases (as where another has been wronged), it becomes a duty to confess our fault to the person injured. But such instances are exceptional and, generally speaking, the need of open confession may be said to be confined to cases where the conscience is relieved by an acknowledgment. In a great majority of cases, no good end is served by making to man the frank and unrestrained avowal of our shortcomings which should reach the ear of God alone, since it is against Him and his law that the offence has been committed, and as he alone can grant forgiveness, if we ask it in Christ's name.

Mrs. J. S. Sr., Eagle, Mich. No human being who ever lived could answer your question as to what God would have done with regard to the world, if Adam and Eve had not sinned? Speculative theologians have expressed the took place. It was at the first full moon after the spring equinox. That is our Good Friday. If he lay in the grave until the third day, and rose on the first day of the week, that would bring it to Easter Sunday.

Mrs. H. F. Coan, Trumbull, Conn., referring to a recent question in THE MAIL-BAG, has forwarded a clipping, which names the Rev. G. C. Waldo, of New London, Conn., as the author of the singular poem beginning:

"Could we with ink the ocean fill."

Mrs. Mari Goodell. What are first cousins, second cousins, double cousins, third cousins?

The children of sisters and brothers are first cousins to each other. When two sisters marry two brothers, their children are

W. W. C., Stoneham, Mass. Do you think Christians can raise the standard of theatres by attending those places?

We think not. On the contrary, the influence of their example would affect others most injuriously. They should take the least others, who look to them for guidance, may be led to stumble. Would it not be reasonable to try to raise the standard of gambling and drinking by such a method you suggest?

J. D. K., Stroudsburg, Pa. Not long ago I attended a sociable in the basement of Sun School room of the church of which I am a member. In wandering through the crowd saw a number sitting about a table, just sitting a game. A hand was dealt out to me reluctantly took it, first, because I didn't care to play; second, because it was God's house and I felt it a desecration. I looked my party over and found an elder's wife, a trustee, and three teachers participating in the game. I, too, had been a teacher in this same room for fourteen years. The thought came to me (Satan's work, course). "If these people, so closely associated with God's work, can play games, eat, drink and be merry, I can." The spirit within rebelled. Matthew 21: 12, 13 came to my mind and was a just rebuke, and I could but won if we were helping to fulfill Timothy's prophecy as given in II. Tim. 3: 1-7. I did not let that house until I had asked God to forgive. The church is God's house set aside especially for his use and for his glory. When it is used for worldly affairs it is an offence to him and a detriment to his cause on earth.

This is not a solitary experience. We have the same feeling of shame and remorse has been felt by many who have found the selves in similar circumstances.

C. W. H., Newark, N. Y. 1. How are we to understand Luke 7: 28? John was the great prophet, yet least in the kingdom? 2. What the present situation of Jewish colonization Palestine? 3. Who was "The Educated Blacksmith"? 4. Are the weevil, potato bug, chinch bug, insects in the roots of grain a new variety or have they evolved from other insects? I have seen it stated that "the sun was cooling off." If so, at what rate?

1. See answer to E. R., Mound's Hill, Ill. in last week's issue. 2. There are several quite successful colonies near Jerusalem, but they are not growing. 3. Elihu Burritt, who was called "The Educated Blacksmith." I was born at New Britain, Conn., in 1818. Write to Agricultural Department, Washington, D. C. 5. Astronomers have calculated that it is "cooling off," but so slowly that there will hardly be any appreciable difference in 10,000 years.

Reader, Milwaukee, Wis. What is the most comprehensive and reliable work on Mormonism that is available for one who wishes to study the question?

One of the best is The Mormon Monster, by Edgar E. Folk, D.D., issued by Fleming H. Revell Company, New York and Chicago.

Miscellaneous

A. R. Mitchell. The meaning of the phrase Per mare, per terras, is "By water, by land." "Forty Winks" means a short nap. Forty is an indefinite number, and means a few. Hamlet said "I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers could not, with all their quantity of love, make up a sum."

R. B. C. R. B. Church lotteries are decidedly objectionable. They have been rightly called "counterfeit methods of giving" and "bogus benevolences," and are entirely at variance with the spirit and example of the approved methods of raising money for the Lord's work. See Mal. 6: 1-4; Jer. 23: 36-40, and related passages.

Another Great Opportunity

We expect to close our offer of slightly damaged sets of the CROWN ENCYCLOPEDIA, at reduced prices, on May 16. If you remit one dollar, on or before that date, you will receive five volumes, neatly packed, charges collected at your end. If you send $1.50 the volume will be delivered free. It is indeed a sacrifice to sell these handsome books at such a price, but as we require the room taken up by these sets, which we cannot send out as absolutely new, we have concluded to give our subscribers the advantage of this bargain. Your money will be promptly refunded should the supply be exhausted before your order reaches us. Read last week's issue for the offer in full.

PUZZLE No. VII.

THE teacher of a school in New York City, in the course of a lesson in Geography, pointed to the Isle of France, which, he said, contained the grave of Harriet Newell, who was once one of his pupils. He told something of her beautiful life, and spoke of her motive in going as a missionary.

One of the class, a little girl eight years of age, was so impressed by the narrative that she determined to go as a Christian teacher to some foreign land.

It was not until her thirty-third year that circumstances made it possible to fulfil this purpose; yet for forty years she was at the head of a school for native girls, one thousand of whom came under her influence and loved her as a mother. She is frequently spoken of as "the mother of a thousand daughters."

? Give her name, and tell where the native school was located ?

view, that in such an event man would have simply remained in his condition of innocence, and that the race would have been represented possibly by these two alone, or else by a multitude of deathless beings, like unto the angels themselves. Will R., Covington, Ky. What poet compares the bee with the greatest of earthly things?

There is such a comparison in Virgil (Georgics IV), which says:

"If all small things with the great we may compare, Such are the bees, and such their busy care; Studious of honey, each in his degree, The youthful swain, the grave, experienced bee; That in the field; this in affairs of state," etc.

Several of the ancient poets wrote in praise of the bee. We believe Ovid has passages similar to the above.

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE NEW REPUBLIC OF PANAMA

Stereograph copyright, 1904, by Underwood & Underwood, New York.

THE RISE OF A REPUBLIC

WITHIN six months after the signing of the Treaty between the United States and the new Republic of Panama, the government has been fully organized, and brought into effective relations with the people of the Isthmus, and with all the interests that centre in that small but important section of the Western world. In assuming its place among the nations, the little Republic has in all its essential features taken the greater Republic as its model. With a duly elected President, a Cabinet composed of men of high intelligence and ability, and a Congress of representatives which enjoys the popular confidence to the fullest extent, the new Republic has a future that is bright with promise. Under the natural protection of this government, and with the prospect of becoming in the near future one of the world's most important commercial centres, it would be strange indeed if the young Republic should not prosper.

In this issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is enabled to place before its readers the first photograph of the First Congress of Panama. Its members, as a whole, will compare favorably with similar representative bodies anywhere. They have been chosen from the best elements of the Isthmian population, and are men all more or less distinguished for their patriotism and ability in public affairs. Commerce, finance, law, the various professions are represented in the personnel of the Congress. Several of the members are notable in address and debate. Their course in legislation will be followed with deep interest, not only by the Panamians, but by many in other lands. It will be well for the future of the Republic if its public men are careful and conservative, avoiding all measures that do not appeal to the best interest of the whole community. In the photographic group on this page, the Congress is placed as follows:

Hon. Fabio Arosemena, Dr. Manuel Amador, first President of Panama, Hon. Hiliodoro Pino, Dr. Pablo Arosemena, first Vice-President of Panama, Hon. Louis de Pond, Hon. Isidro Garcia, Hon. Castulo Villamil.

SECOND ROW—Hon. Juan B. Amador, Hon. Sebastian J. Sucre, Hon. Aurelio Guardia, Hon. M. C. Jurado, Hon. Juan A. Henriquez, Hon. Emeliano J. Ponce, Hon. Pacifico Mendez, Hon. Manuel Quintero.

THIRD ROW RIGHT—Hon. Modesto Ranjel, Hon. J. M. De la Laeton, Hon. Alberto Garcia de Paredes, Hon. Antonio Burgos, Hon. Rodolfo Chiari, Hon. Juan Vasquez, Hon.

Ciro L. Urriola, Hon. Julis Icaza, Hon. Gil F. Sanchez, Hon. Rafael A. Neira, Hon. Nicolas Victoria, Hon. Aristides Arjona, Hon. Manuel S. Pinilla, Hon. Nicolas Tejada.

With the formal transfer of the Panama Canal Company's property to the United States Government, which took place in Paris two weeks ago, the last claim of foreign ownership in the Canal has been surrendered. The French stockholders met and ratified the transfer, which had already been prepared in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and the ownership of the Canal, and the strip of territory on either side along its course, and all the title and interest of the French stockholders, passed to the United States. The transfer was practically unanimous, and the completion of the negotiations is satisfactory to both governments alike. $40,000,000 will be paid over by this Government to the French holders of Canal stock, through a syndicate which has arranged to advance the full amount, in anticipation of the formal payment to be made later through official channels, sometime during the present month. Payment will be made in four drafts of $10,000,000 each. These drafts will be among the largest single warrants ever drawn upon the United States Treasury, and as representing probably the largest sums ever transferred by single slips of paper. When $20,000,000 was paid to Spain at the close of the Spanish-American war, it was made in four checks of $5,000,000 each.

With regard to the claims of the Colombian bondholders of Canal shares, it is understood that our Government will use its good offices with the Republic of Panama, to induce it to assume an equitable share of the bonded obligation of the United States to Colombia. It is expected that the rights of all the bondholders will be protected to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Rear-Admiral John G. Walker and the other members of the Panama Canal Commission, who went to the Isthmus recently to study sanitary and other conditions along the waterway, have now returned. Gen. Walker reports that the sanitary conditions are good. Very little sickness prevails at Colon, although they found a mild type of malaria prevalent. The Commission decided to utilize the old works of the French company temporarily, and will repair and enlarge them if found necessary. The Commission was well received by the Government officials of the new Republic, as well as by the inhabitants of the Isthmus. It expects to organize working parties soon, and will then start on the work of the Canal, going forward with the excavations in the Culebra cut. The headquarters will be at Colon.

PANAMA'S COAT-OF-ARMS

EVERY man casts a shadow. And that shadow always tells for good or evil. Sometimes it is as a cooling shade to defend men from the heat of the noonday sun, sometimes a cloud of darkness to wrap men in the impenetrable night. Sometimes it has healing in its wings, as with Peter. Sometimes it blights and curses, as with Jeroboam. The shadows that we cast are our influence, not however our conscious influence, but the influence which we exert all unconsciously.

We speak much about work and the putting forth of conscious effort for the Master, and very little about the living of our faith before the world. But the truth is, my friends, the living of the faith, or the daily influence of our lives, tells a thousand times more for the Master. It is the shadow of our life that we need to be most careful about. For through this unconscious medium the largest influence of our lives is to be exerted.

Every life here to-day is telling and weighing something. It is telling either for or against Christ. "No star ever rose or set," says Owen Meredith, "without influence somewhere." So no life but which makes its contribution to those forces which are working for the uplifting or the down-pulling of society. You cannot be a negative factor in society. The shadow that you cast is falling over other lives. And it is a shadow either of blessing or blight to every other heart it touches.

And now notice at the outset, as we take up this question, how closely bound we are one to another in society. Suppose I hold in my hand a piece of the hardest steel. I find it almost impossible to cut it or break it. And yet science tells us that my piece of steel, like all other material objects, is made up of an infinite number of invisible atoms which, although bound so closely together that I cannot break them, in reality do not touch each other. Science goes on to say that an infinitesimally small space separates each atom from the other. And yet, although the atoms are thus separated, so closely are they interlocked with one another, and such is the enormous force that holds them together, that they make a single substance. Each atom, too, is influenced by those most near it. If I strike my piece of steel at one end, the impulse is communicated from one to the other until it is felt by every atom. If I apply great heat to it, the forces which hold them are loosened and the atoms are set whirling round each other. I cannot touch a single atom but all the others feel it.

Unconscious Influence

Now, society is such an organization. The individual is the atom and, as an atom, holds peculiar relationship to every other. There are hidden forces which bind society together and make it a unit. We may think we stand alone, but a force, we know not what, binds us to our neighbor. Whatever affects him affects us indirectly. His movement changes ours. Every one we meet or rub against, changes our life just a little, causes us to readjust our relations. That is what makes society so feverish and fitful. The atoms are in a whirl; and so enormous are the forces that hold them together that every individual is influenced by those at his side.

To illustrate what I mean in the most practical way, let us turn to our own experience and see how our lives have been changed and moulded by the influences emanating, all unconsciously, from characters with whom we have been thrown. Some of us probably remember in the early days and beautiful innocence of our childhood, how we were thrown with some one who opened our eyes to the knowledge of evil, and how that other life as it touched our young life left the stain of its defilement upon us. A curse upon the evil that blasted our childish hearts so early! And then again can you not remember how in the early days of young manhood or womanhood, when plastic nature was waiting irresolute to take its form for eternal character, how that another life, pure and manly, touched your life? You may not even have had a speaking acquaintance with that other soul, but you saw a noble soul take a brave and manly stand for itself, and the very sight gave courage to your fainting heart and called you to resolute manliness of character. The heart which influenced yours was all unconscious of its influence, and yet you trace something of the nobility of life and character you hold today to the silent, all-pervasive power of that one life.

The Effects of Association

No feature of electrical science is more interesting to me than the subject of induced currents. Let two wires be stretched alongside of one another a few feet apart. Now suppose you send through one wire a very strong electric current. Although the two wires do not touch each other at all, there will be in the second wire what is called an induced current. Thus if persons are talking over the first wire and I listen with an ear trumpet attached to the second wire, I can hear somewhat faintly, but still quite perfectly, the conversation, because the current in the first wire has induced a similar, though a weaker, current in the second wire. This is the reason why, when you talk through the telephone, you can hear so many other voices. The currents passing over the wires that hang near the wire you are using are reproduced faintly upon your wire. This is the way by which it is possible to telegraph from a moving train. If you put out from the moving car a pole with a wire upon it and hold it somewhere near the wires upon the poles, there will be induced upon your wire a weak reproduction of the current that is passing along the wire on the poles, and with delicate instruments you can read it most accurately. So in return you can send a strong current through your wire on the car, and a current will be induced in the wire upon the poles which can be read at all the offices along the line.

Now the same thing is happening every day in society. Why was it when you stood the other day before that friend of yours whom you recognized to be ambitious and worldly, that you immediately had to fight the same temptation in your own heart? The reason is plain enough. The strong current of selfishness and evil in his life induced a similar current in your own. Just so when you meet a pure and noble character, there is reproduced in your life for the moment something of the same holy influence with which the other life is charged. The whole question of moral influence in life is the question of induced currents. Let any life be strongly charged either with good or evil, and it is sure to induce a current of its own kind more or less strong in every other life it comes near to. There is no escaping this influence. There is no fleeing from it. No soul so pure that does not feel the induced current when standing in the presence of evil. No soul so degraded that does not feel the impulses to a better life stirring within when standing before that which is holy and true.

I think, dear friends, that we fail utterly to appreciate the tremendous power of this influence. It is all the more powerful because unconscious. It is unconsciously exerted and unconsciously received. If we were conscious of it we could rouse ourselves to resist it. But because of its insidious and unobserved approach, it gets its hold upon the heart and life before we are aware of its existence. Whether we know it or not, we are telling in the battle of truth either one way or the other. In the beautiful words of Bishop Huntington, "Some nameless influence has gone out from your least conscious hours, which, by word or look or tone or gesture, has altered and shaped in its little measure every child, man, woman you ever knew." "If thou knewest," exclaims Richter, "that every black thought of thine or every glorious one separated itself from thy soul and took root outside of thee, and for half a century—oh infinitely longer than that—pushed and bore its poisonous or healing roots, oh how piously wouldst thou choose and think!"

And now let me lead you to two most solemn thoughts, which shall bring to practical and individual application this truth before which we are standing.

1. The responsibility of influence. We are all ready to believe that the men who hold high position in the world will be held to strict account for the influence; but many of us feel as if that same responsibility never rests upon us, for our lives are humble and inconspicuous. Now, if this truth has taught us anything at all, it has taught us that no life is without influence, that no life is inconspicuous. You are casting a shadow, whoever you may be, and God himself is going to hold you to strict account for the blighting or blessing which that shadow contains.

An Awful Fame

Look at Jeroboam. It was not for his own sins that he had to answer before God. Nay, rather, eighteen times it is written of him in the Word, "Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who caused Israel to sin." That sentence is the monument of the man. He goes down into history, and will be remembered as long as time lasts as the man who made Israel to sin. Is there any one of us who would like to stand in judgment with Jeroboam? As for me, I would rather take my chances, I believe, with Pontius Pilate, than with him who by the awful influence of his evil life plunged a nation into sin. No man can go to ruin all alone. The trouble is, his life is interlocked with other lives, and like the great tree in the forest, to fall himself means the casting of other lives about him. Here is a man in business. There are many young men around him, his helpers and subordinates. They are learning their business from him. They are going to reproduce in their lives the induced current of honesty and principle, of deceit and wickedness, which they have caught from him. His influence is almost determinative of the future business career of a hundred men, who, almost unconsciously perhaps, are moulded and trained by him. Some of these young men under him to-day may in the future be over a hundred others. And this one business man, if he has founded his business upon dishonesty and wickedness, is going to have his fatal sin perpetuated and carried on and increased in the generations that follow, that it could almost be said of him as of Jeroboam, "who caused Israel to sin."

Parental Responsibility

Here, again, is a father of a family; a man respected and beloved, but indifferent upon the subject of religion. That indifference will be sure to tell, and its influence will be of untold power. I have seen many a noble Christian girl drift into indifference and worldliness because the man she chose to marry, like Gallio, "cared for none of these things." But the most fatal influence of such a man is upon his children. Children look up to their father most of all. They are moulded and influenced by his example. Are there sunny-eyed children, my man, playing about your knee? Ah! those are the children that God has given you, for whom now you would not off your right hand, let me tell you that the current of indifference in your own heart will induce a similar current in their young lives with all the inexorable certainty of the same law in the natural world. And before the great God above, you stand condemned because the shadow which you have cast over your children has been a shadow not of healing power, but of deadly curse and blighting.

Nowhere else are men so criminally careless as they are about their influence in their own homes. They are willing, by their worldliness and indifference and sin, to put not only their own souls into peril, but the souls of those little ones who look up into their faces and call them "father." The same truth holds good in society. How about your shadow here? The world needs many things, but is there one thing that it needs more than a sense of the responsibility of personal influence?

2. But let us rise to a higher thought, and notice the opportunity which this thought suggests.

I venture to say there is not one Christian in this house who has not longed to do something for his Lord. But we have always desired to do some grand thing, some active, conspicuous work which should tell at once and tell conspicuously for Christ. What we need to learn is that we can do our largest work for the Master by simply living truly before men. This age puts its emphasis upon activity and charities. And it has a right somewhat of that greater truth of the power of the holy example. We need to get back again to the thought of making our very shadow tell for the Master. I believe that active work, while a most blessed agency in promoting Christ's kingdom, does not have a title of the power of this quiet, holy, stainless living of religion before the world. Sermons are well enough, but one single life which lives its faith before the world, and illustrates the purity and power of the religion of the Cross, is worth a thousand sermons.

The Power of Holy Living

The best work you can do for your Lord is to obey his commandments and to walk worthy of his name. Put his words and precepts into practice in your daily lives, to ask yourself one question only, "Am I il-

Mormonism Tottering to its Fall

HERE are ominous signs of an impending break-up in the ranks of Mormonism. Never has the infamous Mormon hierarchy been subjected to a more scathing arraignment of its lawlessness, its immoralities, and its treasonable practices than that which it has undergone during the last few months.

When the Senate Committee, in obedience to an overwhelming public demand, began the investigation into the case of Senator Smoot, it was not expected that the inquiry would take the wide range it has developed. It is no longer Smoot, the Apostle, who is on trial; it is the entire system of Mormonism that is now before the eyes of public opinion. Its President, its leaders, its chief counselors, and many of its staunchest defenders, have been brought to the witness stand and compelled, however reluctantly, to make admissions that have startled the nation. Their testimony constitutes the most serious evidence of the kind that has ever been produced, and reveals depths of depravity that have only been hinted at, but never fully understood before. By their own mouths the Mormon leaders have convicted themselves. They stand, self-confessed before the world, as criminals who, in the now familiar phrase of the investigation, are "living in defiance of the laws of God and man."

From its origin, in 1827-28, when Joseph Smith, Jr., adventurer and visionary, professed to have exhumed, with the assistance of an angel, the plates from which the "Book of Mormon" was afterwards translated and published, up to the present time, the whole history of Mormonism has been a long series of extraordinary impositions. The very word "Mormon" itself, is from a Greek term which means a specter, or "hideous she monster," and it was peculiarly fitting that a term so repulsive should have been adopted for a system full of every unclean thing, and which has been accurately described by writers who have studied it and who speak with authority, as "a fraud in the habiliments of pompous sanctity, incarnating lust, guile, feehood, debauchery, murder, despotism, false gods, and spiritual wickedness in high places." It is marked every stage with pretended "revelations," which are simply vulgar blasphemies. Under the sacred name of religion, it has perpetrated infamies that outrival the blackest records of Moslem fanaticism. Those who have read the story of its progress, have found it punctuated with murder and massacre, which went hand in hand with the pretence of a divine mission.

Polygamy is the corner-stone of the Mormon system, and upon this rock it now seems destined to come to final shipwreck. Polygamy has been upheld by every President of the Mormon Church, from Joseph Smith, Jr., the founder (who was shot down in the midst of his infamies by an indignant mob at Nauvoo, Ill.), to the present incumbent, Joseph F. Smith, although several of the later Presidents have made a pretence of obeying the law in public, while violating it privately. At the present time, as the investigation has clearly shown, practically all the leaders are living in polygamy, in Senate Committee more than a hint of what may be expected when the full batteries of investigation are opened at short range. He has confessed that he, the head of the system, still practices polygamy; that the pretence of disapproval is the flimsiest farce; that the Mormons glory in it and in their successful evasion of the law; that the priesthood and apostolate are practically a unit for polygamy. His confession and those of other witnesses lead to the inevitable conclusion that the Mormon hierarchy is bound by its oath, to ignore, and override, and disobey, the Federal statutes on the subject. They declare that polygamy is a divine command, and therefore superior to all human law. Indeed, President Smith was virtually defiant in his attitude before the Committee, and avowed his purpose of maintaining his polygamous faith and practice in sight of all men, and his readiness to suffer under, rather than comply with, the law of the land. A general outline of his testimony, and also that of the other witnesses, has already been given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Joseph Fielding Smith, the present head of the Mormon Church, was born at Far West, Mo., in 1838. He was ordained to be one of the "seventies" in 1858, to the apostleship in 1866, and became a member of the Council of Twelve in 1867. He presided over the Constitutional Convention which framed the Utah Constitution. In 1901, he succeeded Lorenzo Snow as President of the Mormon Church. He is a man of patriarchal presence, with a slightly Jewish cast of countenance and an authoritative manner of address. He is unquestionably one of the ablest and shrewdest men who have held the office. In a recent letter to counsel before the Committee, President Smith said that he was unable to procure the attendance of Apostle Taylor, George Teasdale, Abraham Cannon, Heber J. Grant, M. F. Cowley, Lillian H. Cannon and Marion W. Merritt. Cowley and Merritt have written him that they positively would not appear. One of the witnesses is said to have in his possession some new and very important information against the Mormon leaders, including President Smith himself. The Committee has ample power to compel attendance, and will probably do so at the proper time.

THE MORMON "TITHING-HOUSE," AT SALT LAKE CITY

violation of the laws, and many have entered into new polygamous relations since the passage of the Anti-Polygamy Act.

Within the last few days, the "Apostles" have taken the alarm. Observing the rising tide of popular indignation, they have decided to absent themselves, in order to avoid the ordeal of coming before the Senate Committee as witnesses. Several are reported to have left for parts unknown, suddenly and mysteriously. But the investigation will be pushed vigorously, notwithstanding their absence, and will soon be carried into the enemy's ground. President Smith's testimony has given to the thing in the sight of men these truths which I profess?" I'm not decrying Christian work; far from it. But the Christian worker needs first of all to learn this lesson: casting a shadow which has healing in its wings. He you have the picture of one whose influence tells a way while his work tries to tell the other. It is the dual, double-faced, hypocritical lives that are the curse of our Christianity. They do far more harm than good. Surely the first lesson for the Christian is the lesson of this morning's truth.

Oh think not, my friend, that you are counting nothing for the Christ because conditioned by many pains and sufferings. You have but to bear your pains in Christ-like patience, and your influence shall touch the souls. In your darkness, you think you weigh nothing for the Master, but no heart comes into that chamber of sickness who does not get a blessing. I have known many ones thus conditioned, who counted more for Christ than any other life I knew. So, too, in your griefs, if you bear them submissively, bravely, because God sends them, the power of that triumphant trust will lift some other soul to heaven. No matter where you are, my friend, you can let the shadow of your life be one of healing, just by living your religion through every hour and minute of the day. In business, by working righteousness; in daily domestic cares, by enduring patiently every trial and annoyance, by unselfish ministrations, wherever you see such ministry is needed, by living such a life as this, holy, stainless, Christ-like, the very shadow of your life shall heal and bless the world. Oh! see the blessed opportunity, and count heavily for the Christ by making the unconscious influence of your life to tell for him!

A carpenter came to me one day two years ago, and said: "I want to become a Christian;" and I said: "How do you come to this point, William? Has any one been talking to you? Or have you been to any meetings?" And he said: "No." "How is it then that you are interested?" "Well," he said, "you know John Cudrey, don't you?" And I said: "Yes." "Well, I have worked for three years right alongside of that man, and if Christianity can make a man like him, I want it." Ah, my friends, there was a shadow with healing in it. You wives with unconverted husbands, can win them by living your religion. There is no such influence as that. See to it then that you cast a shadow with healing in its wings.

That's a strange story, Miss Toosey's Mission. But the whole truth of our morning thought is in it. A strange, little old woman, nearly seventy years of age, became all at once fired by a love and enthusiasm for foreign missions. She had heard a sermon from a missionary bishop which wonderfully touched her, and resulted in this simple-minded old heart offering herself as a missionary. The rector of the church was seized with an indescribable fit of coughing, as the little woman in her enthusiasm came to tell him she would like to go to the heathen. He finally told her that her mission was to stay at home, and help the cause by her contributions, her influence, and her prayers.

Most beautiful and pathetic are the ways by which this dear old soul saves her little scanty income for the Master's work. There is a young English nobleman in that city, rich and prosperous, fond of his dogs and horses, without much religion, but a generous, manly fellow. And he finds himself attracted to this strange little old woman and is often at her house. He finds great amusement in listening to her enthusiasm and her foolish ways of saving money for her cause. No one amuses and interests John Rossiter as this quaint old Miss Toosey, whom all the village laughs at for her simple-minded ways. At last one day John Rossiter hears that old Miss Toosey is very ill, and so he goes to see her. He finds her in tears over what she calls the failure of her mission. She could not go to Africa, her influence counted for nothing, she said, for the people only laughed, and her money only footed up a few shillings, which were saved out of her most limited income. She told John how the five barley loaves that she had tried to bring to her Master were all worthless.

That night Miss Toosey died. And that next day John Rossiter sat for many an hour in the little old house with his head upon his hands. There was something in that simple Christian life which touched him. That night John Rossiter wrote to the missionary society of the Church of England offering himself as a missionary to Africa.

This little story, here given only in meagre outline, has almost become a classic now. It illustrates our morning truth. Oh, the power of living your belief, of putting every truth in action, and modestly and inconspicuously being true to the high ideals of holy living. This to me is the purest type of life, so simple and so grand, not claiming place or power or honor, but quietly through a long life illustrating godliness, preaching righteousness by stainless, holy living. This is the kind of Christianity that this world needs, oh so sadly.

Such a life may not have the applause of men. It may be all unnoticed here. Men may count it to be failure. And yet a man like this who takes Christ's truth to heart, and lives that truth through every hour and moment of the day, is ever interpreting to his fellow-men the very character of God; and he is ever winning men to God, because he stands as an object lesson of the power of God in human hearts. Such a man in God's sight is winning eternal honors and stands like a giant among his fellows. Yes, this holy, consistent living of your religion! It gets larger and larger as you study it, until at last it stands uplifted upon a mount of transfiguration. Truly this alone is great. All else is small.

Oh, friends, how about the shadows which we cast? Is there healing or cursing in their wings? These are the questions our morning thought leaves with us. I am not concerned that you should fill the world with the sound of your voice and the glory of your achievements. I care far more that the shadow that you cast may be a blessing. May the dear Lord make us now and evermore to realize the terrible responsibility and the blessed opportunity that come to us through our unconscious influence.

An Arduous Consecrated Life

Dr. J. Herman Romig's Work of Healing and Preaching Among the Eskimos

NOW on his way to Alaska is a young physician, whose labors and self-denying services deserve to be widely known to the Christian churches. The soldier or the sailor who does a deed of daring is lauded and honored as he deserves, but it too often happens that the heroic life of the soldier of the Cross is unknown to the world and his self-sacrifice is unrecorded. Dr. J. Herman Romig has been spending a brief furlough in the United States, and though he has had much to say about the need of his field and the lives and characters of the people among whom he labors, he modestly refrained from speaking of his own hardships and privations. It is well, therefore, that from one who knows the work he is doing, there should come a testimony to his noble service, that we may know how great a soul Christ has among his followers in our own day.

Among the heroic band of missionaries whom the Moravian Church has sent out, is a lady, who shares her husband's arduous life on the borders of the Arctic Circle. Their station is on the Kuskokwim River, where only once a year is there communication with the outside world. It is a bleak, inhospitable region, and its inhabitants are exposed to severities of climate almost inconceivable. The missionaries suffer most, but the Eskimos, who are inured to the climate, are frequently prostrated by illness, and sometimes deaths have occurred which might have been prevented if a skilful physician had been at hand to apply proper remedies. But there was no doctor accessible nearer than at San Francisco, which is nearly three thousand miles away. Many a sad case had this missionary lady seen of suffering unrelieved and pain endured, because no medical help could be procured. Her report of the situation brought relief from her own family. The missionary ardor which had sent her out to labor, was in her own brother's heart, and he volunteered to give his life to the work. The Moravian Church accepted his services, and sent him to the Hahnemann Medical College in Philadelphia to acquire a medical education. He graduated with honor and received the diploma of M.D., and was ordained as a missionary. In 1896 Dr. Romig and his wife, who is herself a skilful trained nurse, arrived at Kuskokwim River, to the great delight of the missionaries.

Dr. Romig found himself, on his arrival, the only doctor between the Yukon and the Nushagak, a distance of fully five hundred miles. He was called upon to treat whites and natives, Greeks and Roman Catholics, heathen and Christians, miners and missionaries, without any distinction. His first amputation case filled the natives with amazement, and after that his power was supposed to be unlimited. His fame spread far and wide, and natives came, on some occasions, three and four hundred miles to see him. This naturally increased the influence of the mission greatly, and soon as he was able to use the language—and even before, by aid of an interpreter—he could bring the glad tidings of the Great Physician to souls inaccessible before.

Responding to medical calls in Alaska involves something more than walking around the block, or getting into a comfortable and speedy motor-cart to treat a more distant case. All the visiting has to be done by boat along the rivers in summer, and by dog-sled in winter. Roads there are none, and the trail must be found by the aid of native guides. A team of eleven dogs stretches out about forty feet, and is directed by the leader, obeying the voice and signals of his owner. A physician's tour under such circumstances is a very complicated undertaking, and requires much skill that is not acquired in city colleges. Every journey is attended by unknown perils, and endless time is consumed. Dr. Romig's records contain accounts of traveling two hundred miles to treat a single case, and when called to the Nushagak, he had to travel four hundred miles by dog-team before he can return to his home.

DR. J. HERMAN ROMIG

The condition of the native patients adds to the discomforts of a physician's practice among them. Most of them live in huts half underground, the entrance to which is by a long, low passage, through which he must crawl on hands and knees. It ends in a room so low that he can scarcely stand in it upright, and its odor from the accumulated filth is overpowering. It is no wonder that living in such places, disease is prevalent, and when an epidemic does break out, as did influenza and measles, four years ago, the mortality is appalling. The terrors of that awful year are still fresh in the memories of the people. Dr. Romig was almost idolized in that scene of suffering, but he and his wife were nearly worked to death. Since then he has prepared a number of medicine satchels, which he has supplied to the missionaries, with directions for their use, so that they may alleviate cases that he cannot reach himself, and give temporary help in the interval, before he can get to accessible cases. In future, he will be stationed at Nushagak River, instead of at Kuskokwim, as that place is more central, and it affords better facilities for travel.

It is now about twenty years since this work among the Eskimos of Alaska was begun. At that time the field was neglected. Since then, Dr. Sheldon Jacobus has worked there with tireless energy and has enlisted the churches in the service, but in 1885 there was no Christian work there of an organized or systematic kind. It is true that the Greek Church had a few missions dating from the time of the Russian occupation, but the influence of them on the Eskimos had been slight. They were regarded as a dull, stupid, ignorant people too degraded to be reached by Christian effort. The Moravians, however, did witness too many of the triumphs of the Gospel when preached by such men as those hungry, patient workers who have gone out under the auspices of that church, to despair of any race or nation. They had men willing to undertake the work and they were sent out. They went to the Kuskokwim River, about 150 miles from its Behag Sea mouth, and there built their station, which they named Bethel.

The first difficulty was to learn the language. No books were accessible; but the missionaries picked it up from the lips of the natives, and patiently extended their communications with a people. They found that the only religion they had was a species of magic, of which the Shamans or Medicine Men were the leaders. Their customs were brutal. Old people who had outlived their power to work, were ruthlessly killed, either by being tied where the rising tide would drown them, or being driven out of the settlement, to freeze or starve to death. Unwelcome children, the care of whom would hinder parents in their work, were abandoned. Morality was utterly unknown. The missionaries had to begin at the very foundation, but they were not discouraged. They went from village to village, and talked with the people in the huts. One by one, converts were won, and the work spread from village to village. A careful selection of these was made for men who were fitted to become native teachers. These were trained and sent to other villages, to prepare the way for the missionary's visit. There are now in the villages, reached from Bethel, over two hundred converts, who have been baptized and have given evidence of conversion. This, too, in a population of little more than five hundred adults scattered along the river banks for a distance of 230 miles. The missionaries at Bethel are Adolf Stecker, B. K. Helmich, Joseph W. Lick, John Heinz and J. H. Schoechert. At the new station on the Nushagak River, S. H. Rock and his wife, and Miss Mary Huber, have been laboring. They are now going on furlough, and the work will be in charge of Paul Zucher and his wife, aided by Dr. and Mrs. Romig. The work is necessarily carried on at heavy cost for so small a church, but it has proved wonderfully successful. Contributions in aid of its support and extension would be exceedingly welcome.

Children from Many Lands

A Vast Army of Juvenile Immigrants Now Reaching Our Shores

A SICILIAN BOY

A WEE, YIDDISH MAID

THE SLAV CHILD-TYPE

FROM SUNNY ITALY

FROM FAR LITHUANIA

IT is "rush" day at Ellis Island, and here the children come from the ships in which they have made that wonderful voyage across the ocean. From the four corners of the earth they come, thousands of them each year augmenting the number.

Some of these little ones are dark-haired and ruddy, some red-haired and freckled, others flaxen-haired and pink-cheeked. Some seem awe-inspired by the strange scenes about them, while others are simply amused and interested.

Born in the shadow of Greek Temples or Pompeian ruins, bronzed by the sun of Southern Italy, or from a nativity where the chill winds blow—in Norway, Sweden or the steppes—they enter our land of to-day; where the siesta is unknown, and where the clock but chronicles the hours of toil.

They have left far behind them the roads along which many of them were wont to chase the careless, generous coin-throwing tourists. They have gazed for the last time at the mountains of Galicia and Montenegro; the fig-trees of Syria, and the olive groves of Spain and Portugal are things of the past.

Here, in place of the low, white-walled, and yellow, tile-roofed houses of their home villages, are great piles of brick and stone, towering nearly to the skies, and all dotted with tiny windows, so far up towards the clouds that the little things shudder, and are afraid when they first look out, and down to the faraway ground.

The strange sights and sounds are too much for the children to take in or to comprehend at once. They listen to the shrill whistles, signals of the crowds of river craft, in wonder, for the ears of these little alien travelers are accustomed to nothing louder than the tinkling bells of the sheep on the hillside, or more startling than the rippling waters of the brook that flowed past their humble home. What a study the faces of these little people present. Here, tenacity is pictured in the countenances of the little Yiddish or Jewish children, while in the faces of their neighbors, the Polacks, Slavonians, Finns and Russians, is seen stolid determination and the strength of strong parentage. In the eyes of Pepe, the child of Aragon, the sloth is shown, the stamp of reliability is seen in the sallow-faced Syrian, while the French gamine clearly depicts nonchalance.

Carlito, who is running up and down the steamship pier while the crowd is awaiting transportation to Ellis Island, is enjoying himself immensely. Chasing goats along the banks of the Tagus was not half so much fun as this, and he wishes that his Portuguese playmate of San Ildefonso, with whom he used to play at bull-fighting, could see him now! He brings to America the recklessness of his race, its cunning, its violence of temper, and love of ease. All these things he injects into the blood of the nation which he has adopted, and he will also add a touch of poetry and a drop of the essence of chivalry. The racial melange, of which the child of every race admitted into this country is an element, gives an ethnological interest to their individualities, and as certainly as the needle points to the pole, each and every one of these individualities will blend into the national blood and temperament.

In this there is a grave menace where formerly there was great beauty. Thirty years ago, this nation was enriched by Anglo-Saxon corpuscles admitted at Castle Garden, to-day it is being augmented by Latin, Hebrew and Slavonic corpuscles injected though the great artery of Ellis Island. Thirty years ago, Great Britain sent us 16326 immigrants, Germany, 149,671; last year Great Britain sent through Ellis Island 45,546, Germany 28,304, a falling off of 242,647.

The Jewish, Italian and Syrian now predominate, flanked by a generous number of Myars, Ruthenians and Poles, and while the children will grow up and become like Americans, they each have their hereditary traits, that govern future destinies. They pass through Uncle Sam's great clearing-house on the little island in the upper bay, one by one, each with his particular trait, racial or otherwise, each a seed that will germinate and grow into a flower or a weed. It is this diluting of the national characteristics with so much devitalized blood, which appals, when studied at close range in the faces of the immigrant children, and when colonized in the alien quarters of the great cities, propagates its harmful influence in the social and moral standing of the community.

And what is all this for? Why are these children dragged from their country homes, to be thrust, many of them, into rooms at the end of a dark passage somewhere away up in the awful, crowded, ramshackle tenement in the "Mulberry?"

Who shall fathom the thoughts of these little men and women, suddenly thrown from the calm serenity of Andalusian fields or the solemn grandeur of the mountains into the turmoil of humanity, where passion and effort sway the life of an American city. Children are particularly susceptible to impressions, especially if they be of foreign parentage; their minds, though not bent on the abstract, can find in the concrete of their surroundings enough to awaken in them feelings of wonder and awe. Their soft, big eyes of wonderment begin to open when the seaboard is reached, and they embark on the wide ocean of adventure that means opportunity for their fathers to-day, and also for them later.

The little Polack girl, with her gaudy shawl and bright head-covering, is heir to the sweat-shop, and to the vermin-haunted slums of New York. Deliberately exiled from school by rapacious, and perhaps needy parents, she will be sent to some Grand or Allen Street factory, there to earn thirty cents a day at the expense of her physical, moral and mental health. There is a look of premature disenchantment on some of the children's faces, those from the northern parts of Europe having by far the brighter countenances.

Little Augusta holds her doll close to her as she passes up the narrow aisle, where the man at the desk asks her mother her name, age, and how much money they have, she wonders a great deal at what she sees; her eyes are blue, and the glow of health is on her chubby cheeks. Stockholm is many miles away, but the rapid change of scenes in the past few weeks occupies her mind to the forgetfulness of Stockholm.

Away out in the timber lands of Minnesota are her father and brothers, and she will soon be with them. She will grow up and be the mother of many children, and also their slave, for she has in her those inherited traits which destines her to a life of happy servitude in her home. Domesticity is her chief characteristic, and it will develop and expand on the farm, whither she is bound. She will grow up strong, taking a hand in harvesting the crops, and be a help to all.

In the eyes of the little Danish girl there is astonishment at the American presentment of life. She is but a little dot upon this vast bewildering scene, but she has a perfect though blind confidence in the protecting care of her father, and no less prosaic mother. And all these little children look like those we have seen before, who but yesterday gravely explained that the sun was a great golden lamp, and the sky a vast carpet of blue, "like sister's dress." In many of the childish faces there is an evidence of soul ready to receive life's first impressions, and it is a study to watch them, as they flash into the large Ellis Island building, and to note the expression of their eyes as they behold the wonderful things about them.

From the clinging, timorous, little Irish girl, to the French boy, brilliant and restless, scrambling from one piece of mischief to another, as fast as his badly bruised legs will carry him, is a wide range of temperament and character; but there is not such a difference in their immediate prospects. The little girl is the woman in miniature; the boy is essentially the boy. The very toys of the girl are the prototypes of her future concerns—the doll and the kitchen set—but the boy does not reflect the future father and householder, he does not assume any of its responsibilities; its privileges only are his.

This is the parade of the little ones that annually march to our shores, and to-morrow it will be the same as to-day, and the next day, and the day after that, until the Gate of Nations is let down.

Among the Workers

CROSSLEY AND HUNTER, Canadian evangelists, recently closed a mission in the Austin Section of Chicago. Five hundred and fifteen names were received by the secretary of one avowing decision for Christ. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists and Christians joined in the work.

—EVANGELIST F. E. P. JENNINGS, recently closed a series of successful meetings at Newtown, Mo., which brought many accessions to the Baptist church in that place. He afterwards labored at Democrat Ridge where over fifty confessed Christ. This was followed by meetings at Dundas, which were attended by marked spiritual results.

—A SERIES of evangelistic meetings, lasting four weeks, has just closed at Kansas City, Kan. The meetings were conducted by Rev. L. E. Coad, evangelist, and Prof. C. S. Colburn, singer, were held in Chelsea Congregational Church. Many made confession of faith, and the membership of the church was greatly increased.

Strangers in Church

SO many people move in the spring, that in the early summer many find it convenient to seek a new church home. A very real loneliness falls upon one who, for the first time, leaves a church where pastor and people are the friends of years, and goes to one where not a face is familiar. Certain churches have an air of conservatism which is almost repellent, and which effectually shuts the door in the face of the stranger, who does not venture into their chilled precincts a second time, if it can be helped. Other churches are hospitable and friendly in their air of welcome, and the one who is shown into a pew is not made to feel in the way. There is a gracious manner of handing a hymn-book or a fan which goes straight to the stranger's heart.

One who goes to a church in the hope that it may become a home, should not be too shy in introducing himself to the notice of the pastor or church officials. It is comparatively easy to carry a moment after service, that some one may have a chance to give a kind greeting. All the advances must not be on one side; it is a good plan to meet friends half way.

Sinless Lives

FEW questions come to this journal so frequently, as the one, whether it is possible to live a sinless life. Sometimes the question is accompanied by a confession of wrong-doing, which has evidently been wrung from a heart sincerely repentant, and often with expressions of despair of the future. There is real sorrow, but with that, so vivid a consciousness of weakness, that there is apprehension of a repetition of the same sin, or the commission of some other sin.

Even in such letters, there is ground for encouragement. There is always hope when sin is followed by repentance. It is the man who is indifferent, who has no regrets for what he has done amiss, who is in a critical state. If he feels that sin is unavoidable, that he has done no worse than his neighbors, and that pardon is assured in any case—he is on the way to a state of degradation, and his Christian character is in danger of fatal deterioration. Sorrow is a good sign, even if it does not end in amendment. But its natural outcome is amendment; and there is no reason why it should fail of its proper fruit.

Another ground for encouragement, is in the effect of discipline. The soul should never be cast down by the fact of conflict. It is not the tree that is shielded from the winds that comes to perfection, but the tree that is exposed to the blasts and storms of winter, and strikes its roots deep into the soil. The promise is not to the quiet, calm, undisturbed soul, but to him that overcometh. No man, therefore, should lament the struggle, however sorely he laments his defeat.

The proper course to take, is that which would be adopted in the concerns of ordinary life. After the first essential of confession to God and pleading for pardon in the name of Christ, the duty is to study the circumstances which led to transgression, the state of mind which preceded it, and the peculiarities of the personal character. Every man has some vulnerable part of his nature, by which temptation effects an entrance more easily than at other parts. That weak part of the soul's fortifications needs to be specially guarded. The sin which most successfully besets, is the one to be dreaded and resisted. The fight is with a wily and treacherous enemy, and all the skill with which a man is endowed should be summoned to the conflict. This is a matter of personal precaution, which is due from the Christian to his Lord. He must co-operate with Him to prove his sincerity, if for nothing else.

The real basis of hope lies in God himself. He promises strength to those who seek it earnestly and sincerely. There are times and cases in which he undertakes the conflict and removes the tendency to a special sin; but generally his course is to give his child the strength to fight the battle. It is important to have the conviction that such strength will be given. The natural inference, then, is that there is no need for falling. With omnipotent aid given, no man is under an obligation to sin, no matter how strong the temptation. This conviction, however, ought never to produce a sense of security. No one is so likely to fall as he who is proudly confident of his safety. There must be constant vigilance, but it is not the vigilance of one who fears that he is going to fall, but of one who is ready to meet the enemy, and is sure of victory in Christ's strength. He must expect conflict, his safety may be often in peril, but with the power and grace accessible to him, he may be sure of overcoming. The firm resolve that, by God's grace, the fight against sin shall never cease, and the unwavering conviction that He is able to keep us, is the way to sinlessness of life.

Slavery in South Africa

HEARTY sympathy will be given by Christian people in this country to the determined men in Great Britain and South Africa, who are opposing the concession that the British Government has made to the mine owners of the Transvaal. These mine owners contend that there is a scarcity of unskilled labor in the Transvaal. They desire to import from China 250,000 laborers to work in the mines. They undertake to house and feed them well; to pay them a stipulated wage, and take them back to China at the end of three years.

The proposal looks fair on its face, but it is obvious on examination, that the opponents of the scheme are justified in denouncing it as practical slavery. The men who are to be taken to the mines would be deprived of their liberty during their term of service, and it would be easy to tempt them into expenditures that would render them slaves for life. We can imagine, too, how easily the stipulated conditions might be evaded, and how hard might be the fate of these poor men.

The demand of the mine owners for this concession is based on pure greed. The only advantage of coolie labor is its cheapness. The difference between the rate paid to the Chinaman and the rate of free labor, would, it is stated, amount to about a dollar and a quarter a ton of ore mined. Considering how many unemployed men in England there are, who would be glad of such work, the project of importing coolie labor shows the selfishness of the men. On that ground, apart from the unrighteousness of the scheme, the opposition to it is justified. It is extraordinary that the Government should have given its consent to it. The conscience of the religious part of the public has been thoroughly stirred, and protests are being made in and out of Parliament, against a project which sullies the fair fame that Great Britain has so long enjoyed of being the enemy of slavery in every form.

Out of Doors

IF the full meaning of those three little words were understood and acted upon, we should have a much happier time in this world of ours. The taste for doors is an acquired one. We are not born with it, everyone knows that it is well nigh impossible to keep a boy or girl in the house. There is an unrest among children when they are too closely housed, with nothing but an open door and permission to rush through it will conquer.

What wonderful pleasures and wholesome weariness come to the children who spend their waking hours—most of them—in the fresh-air and sunshine. In summer or winter, whether city-bred or country-born, a little one is never really happy shut within four walls. If we, older folks, would only follow this example and find more of our pleasures and recreations in the open world, we would be afflicted with fewer headaches, with their accompanying sighs and groans, fewer aches and pains of all kinds, and we should also be much pleasanter people to live with.

There is nothing like exercise in the open air to drive the cobwebs of the "blues," from our spirits, and there is no better kind of pleasurable exercise than that afforded by the bicycle—now within the reach of nearly all classes. Swiftly speeding along a country road, the rapidly changing scene, the smooth, gliding movement, and the little muscular effort required in propelling a modern wheel, are all factors, which, combining, make bicycling an ideal out-door pleasure. With the good spring days, there comes an overwhelming desire to get out in the open, and to revel in the sweet air and sunshine.

But alas! there are too many reasons why we cannot yield to this most natural feeling. So much is to be done, and so little time in which to do it, that we debar ourselves, what would seem to be our very birthright by virtue of our being upon this beautiful earth. We wake up to the fact that "the earth and the fullness thereof" are ours—that "no millionaire in castle grand can claim a costlier store"—we gaze with enraptured sight on God's beautiful Out-of-Doors. Then we must appreciate the fact that houses, and all that are in them, are only secondary considerations, and that the sum and substance of our existence. When we fully realize that health and happiness—those twin sisters—can never dwell long with those who persistently shut themselves up within walls; when we become acquainted with the hills and valleys, the fields and streams; when the trees tell their stories and the brooks sing their songs to us, then we begin to know what God meant when he beheld everything he had made, and pronounced it good.

$1,200 Worth, of Our Great War Atlas Given Away

IF you have not already taken advantage of our liberal offer, to present FREE with every nine weeks' NEW subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a copy of the Rand-McNally Russo-Japanese War Atlas, do it at once, as this is positively your last opportunity! We have about Two Thousand copies left, and while they last we will give them away, in order to introduce the Queen of American Weeklies into as many thousands of homes where it has never been taken before.

A Most Remarkable Proposition

Remember, you have only to send twenty-five cents to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for nine weeks. If you are already a subscriber, invest twenty-five cents for one of your friends or relatives, and take the Atlas for yourself. You will have more than your money's worth. This is a premium of surpassing interest and value, and it will be treasured long after the war is over. It has a marginal index, giving the area and population of every country and every group of islands in the world. It also gives the population and location of the principal cities and provinces of Russia, China, Japan, and Korea, enabling you to locate, immediately, any place about which you may read in the course of the war.

This offer is still open only to the first two thousand people who send a nine weeks' trial subscription, and not more than one copy may be sent to the same address. Write to-day, as the supply will soon be exhausted.

Quaint Ceremony in Russia

ONE of the strangest celebrations in all Europe is that illustrated on this page. It takes place on Easter eve, on the steps of the Cathedral of St. Isaac, in St. Petersburg. Easter is the great event of the year in the Russo-Greek Church. Not so poor, but some little luxury of dress or diet is provided, though it may represent the careful saving of months. Passion week is a season of gloom and solemnity, but on Saturday there are signs of the approaching festival. Preparations are made in all homes to observe it with rejoicing. Late in the evening the churches are crowded, and all the houses are deserted. About eleven o'clock the throngs gather on the steps of the churches, and the Cathedral of St. Isaac is the Mecca of hundreds of citizens eagerly seeking a place on the stones at its base. Rich and poor, alike, struggle for a seat there, for on this day social distinctions are temporarily disregarded. The inherent respect of the Russian for rank and title is evident in the deference paid to the noble, but he is not seduced by it from the crowding of the people, who feel they have a right to share with him the privileges of this sacred celebration. Every one has a candle with him, and as they are lighted, the vast area glows with a pyramid of flickering gums. The candles are set on peculiar square cakes, baked specially for the occasion. Some have eggs, also, and meat, and a wine, but no one eats until the sonorous sound of the bells in the tower above have tolled at midnight hour, and from far and near the bells of other churches answer like echoes. Then the priests emerge from the cathedral, and solemnly bless the assembled crowd. Every one crosses himself as they pass, and then the provisions begin to disappear; for they are hungry with long fasting. Congratulations and embraces express the joy of the people. "The Lord is risen," one says to his neighbor, and is answered with "The Lord is risen indeed." Subtleties, with many, the words are merely a form of seasonable getting, and are not understood to imply any principle affecting spiritual life. To few, even among spiritually-minded people, do those words convey so momentous a meaning as the Apostle gave them.

That I may know him and the power of his resurrection... if by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead (Phil. 3: 10, 11).

Aroused Every Citizen

The police and fire departments of Mount Vernon, N. Y., had a busy night recently. There was an accident at the gas works shortly before midnight, and every light in the town was extinguished. The difficulty was soon set right, but it then occurred to the authorities that if any one in the town had gone to sleep leaving a gas burning, there would be a strong probability of their being asphyxiated. There are about five thousand houses in the town, besides those at Pelham, which are supplied by the same company. It was resolved to arouse someone in every household, and give them warning of the danger. Accordingly the fire department was instructed to drive through the streets, blowing its siren whistle to arouse the sleepers, and policemen followed to give verbal explanation of the disturbance. Every house was to be visited, and if at any time there was no response, the door was to be forced and the warning given. In only six cases was there need to make a forcible entrance, and though there were several narrow escapes from asphyxiation, there was no one seriously affected. The prompt measures taken undoubtedly saved many lives. There were some who complained of being aroused from their slumbers, but there were no complaints from those who were thus saved from being poisoned by the escaping gas. The ministers and Christian workers who warn people of their danger from injury by the pollution of the moral atmosphere, do not always find their efforts so thoroughly appreciated.

These men do exceedingly trouble our city and teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive (Acts 6: 20).

Oysters Under Ban

At a recent meeting of the New York County Medical Society the question of danger of infection from eating raw oysters was discussed. Dr. Cyrus W. Field called attention to the experiments which had been made by the department of health, which had proved that typhoid bacilli contained in an oyster were alive customary signal to reduce speed. He was surprised to see that no attention was paid to his signal. The big wheels continued their rapid revolutions. He called down his speaking tube, but there was no response. In another moment the boat, at full speed, struck the rack and heeled over till the opposite rail was almost at the water's edge. The speed continuing, the boat struck the other rack, splintering the poles, and crushing in the cabin. Then it went direct for the bridge, crashing into the iron-bound edge, and breaking its own bow. It rebounded fully twenty feet, and then struck the bridge squarely again, with a force that sent the splinters flying in all directions. Men on the bridge threw out chains in an effort to hold the boat, but none of them caught. There was another rebound, and again a crash. Then the wheels stopped, and the damaged boat was secured. Most of the panic-stricken passengers hurried ashore, but many of them were lying on the deck and in the cabins with broken limbs, and others insensible from injuries of the head. The mystery was explained when the fireman came on deck. He had been some distance from the engine-room when the pilot gave his first signal and noticed that it was not heeded. He hurried to the engine-room, and there found the engineer dead on the floor from apoplexy. Happily he knew how to shut off the steam and promptly did so. It was supposed that such an accident could not occur after the law was passed, requiring that two pilots should be on every boat; but it was overlooked that the pilot might be there and give instructions which could not be obeyed if the engineer was dead. Many moral disasters have an analogous cause. Men know what they ought to do but the will to do it is powerless.

What I would that do I not; but what I hate, that do I (Romans 7: 15).

BRIEF NOTES

The Christian Endeavor Sailors' Home at Nagasaki, Japan, last year had 2,891 guests, and served 10,299 meals.

Grace Greenwood, an authoress, beloved by young people the world over, died recently at New Rochelle, N. Y. She was in her eighty-first year. Her real name was Mrs. Sara Jane Lippincott.

A recent report of the Duxhurst Institution, conducted by Lady Henry Somerset, for the reclamation of female drunkards, states that of the inmates during the past nine years, sixty per cent, were permanently reformed.

Dr. Isadore Dyer, physician of the Lepers' Home of Louisiana, is authority for the statement that leprosy can be cured if it is treated in its early stages. During the past ten years, he said in a recent lecture, he had succeeded in completely curing twelve lepers. In another decade, he believes that leprosy will be as curable as typhoid.

Dr. Karl Schmidt has completed a work which will shortly be published in Berlin, under the title of the Acts of Paul. It consists of a Coptic manuscript of the date of 180 A.D., said to have been the work of an elder of the early Christian Church. It is regarded as apocryphal, but contains information that may be of value. When found it was in small fragments of papyrus. The work of piecing them together and translating them has occupied Dr. Schmidt for seven years.

The warrant under which John Bunyan was committed to jail has been found. It is signed by thirteen justices and sets forth that "one John Bunnyon Tynker hath divers times within one Month past in contempt of his Majties good Lawes preached or taught at a Conventicle Meeting or assembly under color or p'tence of exercise of Religion in other manner than according to the Liturgie or practice of the Church of England." It commits him to prison and, as we know, he went there and wrote the Pilgrim's Progress. The warrant was sold by auction for $1.525 a few days ago.

Important Notice

Subscribers who wish to take advantage of our offer of slightly damaged sets of the CROWN ENCYCLOPEDIA, at $1 each, will please mail their orders before May 16, as we do not expect to have any sets remaining after that date. Remember, the insides are perfect in every respect, and the damages to the covers are so slight that most persons would not know them from new. MIDNIGHT CELEBRATION ON THE STEPS OF ST. ISAAC'S CATHEDRAL, ST. PETERSBURG and active after nine days. Dr. Walter Benschel, the Sanitary Superintendent, reminded the assembled doctors of the outbreak of typhoid which occurred at Middleton, Conn., some few years ago, when, after a supper of the students of the University, everyone who had partaken of oysters was prostrated by the disease. He attributed it not to any special infection in the oysters, but to the fact that they had been freshened in a part of the river where the sewers from two districts emptied themselves. The general consensus of opinion was, that a law should be enacted by the Legislature requiring that oyster beds should always be in pure, fresh water or in deep sea bottoms. It was, said one doctor, a gross injustice to a most useful and nutritious article of food to surround it with pollution and then blame it for becoming foul. It would be well if the same principle were remembered in our associations with the world.

Passengers in Peril

More than three hundred persons, who were on a ferryboat a few days ago, going from New York to Brooklyn, were thrown into panic by the death of an engineer. The boat made its way as usual across the river, and as it approached its slip, the pilot gave the

BRIGHT CHILDREN OF THE CANARIES

MRS. T. MACKNIGHT of the Teneriffe Mission, Canary Islands, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the mission school in Santa Cruz is prospering. This year the numbers have gone up from fifteen or twenty children to eighty-four boys and girls. It is a bright and happy school. The girls in the group shown in the photograph were dressed as "vendedoras" (sellers of almonds), and sang appropriate pieces. They learn many Scripture texts, the Commandments, poems and hymns. Those who attend the day school attend Sunday School, also.

Good work has been done by our two excellent missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. H. Brown, and by the trained head teacher. Two converted Bible-women are also working with the mission. The field lies chiefly amongst the poor. There are the usual difficulties, as in all Spanish lands, and great persecution all the time. The school now needs another trained teacher to help. Many of the children are converted, and show their faith in their testimony and prayers at the Thursday meeting.

"The need here is so great, and the difficulties so tremendous," writes Mrs. Macknight, "that I am compelled to seek help, that there may be more teachers and helpers. We are here without a missionary society at our back. $1,000 a year is required for the salaries of our missionaries, two trained teachers, rent of mission house, two Bible-women, and various other expenses.

"A Cuban young man—a member of the Christian Protestant Church—came to Santa Cruz for his health. He was robbed, and cast adrift in the streets without friends, and ill. A fortnight later, one of our workers found him in the street. He told her he was a Christian, and asked if there was such a thing as a Protestant Church in Santa Cruz. She helped him, and communi-

Most of the people have never seen a Bible; sixty per cent. of them cannot read, and they pray to images made of wood, which they are pleased to call saints.

"We hope to be used of God soon to establish here a Spanish pastor and church. Earnest prayers of people are going up for this."

cated the matter to our missionary, Mr. Brown, who vainly sought aid for him from the Consul. Our missionary agreed to daily send him and to visit and pray for him. He was very grateful, and was to be found every day with the Testament in his hand, and looking forward with great joy to the daily visits. This man—Miguel Garcia—died, and the mission bore the expense of the funeral, which was the first of its kind in Santa Cruz, and caused quite a sensation in the town. The quiet burial service was held in the English cemetery, where the little band of Christians and school children sang, 'Voy al cielo peregrino' ('I go to heaven; I am a pilgrim'). After the service, a Roman Catholic came up and said, 'The Protestant general is very good and Christianlike. I hope when I die to be buried like that.'

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

ON April 23, Gen. Kouropatkin telegraphed to the Czar that he had decided to take the offensive, as he regarded the force at his disposal sufficient for the purpose. He added that he would leave nothing to chance. Immediately afterward he advanced a force of infantry from Liao-yang toward the Yalu, supported by Cossacks. An additional force of 5,000 Cossacks is also advancing on northeastern Korea, some distance from the river. All the indications pointed to an early crossing of the Yalu by the Japanese, and the Russians in southern Manchuria were in expectation of an attack.

A Seoul dispatch stated that arrangements for concerted movements by the Japanese were completed on April 20, when there was to be a simultaneous rush from three points. The second army is supposed to have sailed from Japan on April 16, probably for Port Arthur. Other troops were to land at Taku-shan or Tatung, forming part of the general advance on Liao-yang. The Guards' Division, under Lieut.-Gen. Inouye, were to be the first troops sent against the Russians at Kuliencheng.

That this movement was carried out, at least in part, would seem to be evident from the events that followed. It should be remembered that the reports, in a great majority of instances, are exclusively from Russian sources, as the correspondents are apparently still far from the Japanese front. Gen. Kouropatkin, on April 25, telegraphed to the Czar that small parties of Japanese for several days had been seen landing pontoon material, collecting boats, and preparing bridges near Wiju, and also near Sigon, a considerable distance further up the river. A Japanese detachment of infantry and some cavalry had already crossed the river near Simpoussikho and were preparing to cross at Piokdong, still higher up. On the same date (April 25) a St. Petersburg dispatch brought the intelligence that a party of 500 Japanese, who were crossing the river on rafts, were practically annihilated by the Russians. This dispatch, however, was not confirmed by later cablegrams.

On April 26, the main Japanese army began to cross the river at several points simultaneously, under the protection of warships and torpedo boats. At first, under cover of a feint at Tatung-kao, a crossing was effected several miles further up stream, near Tchang-jiou, and these troops quickly entrenched. Under cover of their guns, reinforcements were rushed over the river. A St. Petersburg cablegram explained that the passage of the Yalu by the enemy was, in no sense, to be regarded as important, the Russians having no intention of vigorously contesting the passage. There was some sharp fighting between Russian skirmishers and the Japanese at Turen-yang-Yalu and Mukden-Niu-Chwang lines. Forty thousand men are occupying fortified positions along the Yalu, and 20,000 are posted at Taku-shan, at the head of Korea Bay. They also occupy the banks of the Tumen River, from the Russo-Korean frontier to Lake Tai-tji (Paik-tou-San) on the Manchurian-Korean frontier, near the source of the Yalu.

That the Japanese have invaded Manchuria

the troops forming the second line of the Russian defence. At the same time, the Russian force along the Tumen River, in northeast Korea, were reinforced, with a view to a possible flank movement.

On April 27, a St. Petersburg dispatch reported that the Russian Vladivostok fleet, which had already sunk two small Japanese merchant steamers—the Goyo and the Namuro—in the neighborhood of Gensan, on the east coast of Korea, encountered at sea the Japanese troopship Kinschiu, and demanded her surrender. The officers of the transport, deeming resistance futile, yielded and were taken prisoners. The Russian warships took aboard 17 officers, 20 soldiers, coolies and 65 of the crew, who had surrendered, but some 200 men remained on the Kinschiu and refused to yield. Though without officers, they resolved to fight, and immediately manned the four Hotchkiss rapid fire guns of the troopship. Thereupon the Rossia sent a torpedo into the Kinschiu, and sank her with all who remained on board. Though a Japanese squadron has been searching for nearly a week for the Russian warships, the latter, it is believed, succeeded in returning to Vladivostok without being intercepted. This is the first serious disaster that has befallen the Japanese navy since the war began.

On May 1, the first important land battle of the war took place at Kuliencheng, resulting in a Japanese triumph. After five days of fighting (from April 26), principal with long range artillery, the main body of Gen. Kuroki's army, which had successfully crossed the Yalu, advanced upon the Russian position. Gen. Sassulitch, the Russian commander, had his troops advantageously posted on a height near Khussan, but the Japanese after considerable maneuvering, succeeded in turning the Russian left flank, and then attacked the main position at Kuliencheng.

Being superior in numbers and artillery, they made such a fierce onset that the Russians, though making a stout defence, were compelled to retire, which they did in good order along the Polietyntzy road. The Japanese occupied the evacuated position, and at last accounts fighting was still in progress. The estimated losses in killed and wounded were, Japanese 700, Russians 800, the latter including many officers who were picked off by Japanese sharpshooters. The Japanese gunboats on the Yalu, and their batteries on the Korean shore, assisted in the attack.

JAPANESE TROOPS FORDING THE RIVER IN NORTHERN KOREA

chen and Tchindiaon, and the Russian advance, with a howitzer, succeeded in demolishing the pontoon nearest to Wiju.

The Russians are very strongly posted north of the river, and hold the country in great strength in the direction of Liao-yang. They are reported to have completed the concentration of their forces on the Mukden-Liao-in considerable force is made clear by the dispatches of April 28. They occupied Kuliencheng, on the northerly bank opposite Wiju, and, at latest reports, were still pouring troops across and into the territory lately held by the Russians, in such numbers as to threaten the latter from three sides. General Kouropatkin ordered a retrograde movement by the troops on the right bank of the river, who rejoined

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Travel to St. Louis

THOUSANDS of young girls who have never before left the shelter of their own homes, are this summer turning eager eyes to St. Louis and the great Exposition. Among them are many who wish to seek employment, and naturally hope to find profitable and pleasant work during the weeks when the great city will be thronged with crowds of sight-seers from all over the land. Others are going simply for recreation, desiring to spend some time in the enjoyment which a great World Exposition always affords. It is necessary for these girls to go alone to the Exposition if they go at all. In a great number of instances they have been saving their money for this purpose perhaps for several years, and they are the daughters of homes which have no margin for much beyond necessary daily expenses, it is obvious that they must count very closely in the one case, or soon find work in the other, to escape the alternative of being destitute in a strange city.

The Exposition "Travelers' Aid Committee," organized by women who know the dangers of an unfamiliar city, even in its normal condition, may present to unexpected girls, lifts a warning voice to the young women. The conditions which always inhere in city life are a thousand-fold intensified, when the city is expanded to many times its ordinary population, and when people from every part of the nation and the globe are gathered within its limits. Among these are many who are designing and unscrupulous. It is quite possible that young women, in utter innocence and ignorance, may be lured into places from which they cannot escape, and into associations which will cast a black and baleful shadow over their entire lives.

Take the case of the young girl arriving in St. Louis alone, not knowing where to go, asking direction of some one whose interest it is to mislead her; even if this should not prove the case, when her money is exhausted and she has no means of getting home, what is she to do? Where is she to stay? How shall she meet an emergency? In the first place, we would say to all girls contemplating a visit to the Exposition: do not go alone if you can help it. It would be very much better for you to attach yourself to a company of friends or neighbors, or to go accompanied by at least one or two friends. Before leaving home, address a letter to the Y. V. C. A. in St. Louis, asking for a safe place where you may board; ascertain how much money will be needed for any of one week, ten days, two weeks, or month. On arriving in St. Louis, do not accept assistance or ask advice from, or of, strangers whom you may meet on the trains. Apply to the conductor for all information. At Central stations look for the agents of the Travelers' Aid Committee, who will wear blue badges, with "Travelers' Aid Agent" inscribed in gilt letters. At the Union station in St. Louis, these agents will be found at all incoming and outgoing trains.

Remember that you cannot be sure of obtaining work after your arrival in St. Louis. Thousands of positions have been arranged for, long before the opening of the Exposition. Great numbers of young women, who go in the hope of obtaining work, will come away bitterly disappointed. Do not go except with the full consent of your father and mother, and if they are untried and inexperienced people, ask advice before you leave home of the resident secretary of the Y. W. C. A. in your town, or of your pastor. Be sure that you do not go to St. Louis without taking with you money enough to bring you safely back to your home.

Children's Sayings

Children say many quaint and original things that their elders smile at, and that add to the joy of the daily life. A Sunday School, not far from New York, the infant class was gathered the other Lord's Day, and teacher was talking to them about good behavior. She told them how wrong it was to be unkind and selfish, how hateful to make people unhappy, and how much better it was to try never to hurt any one, nor to make any one sad. "If we are cross and rude and disagreeable, if we fret and fuss and fume children, why, what will we be?" she exclaimed.

"Goups," piped up little Mary. Whoever has read the clever "goup" rhymes that the children love, will know what Mary meant.

A certain small boy was not very mannerly, and a fastidious uncle came to see the family, and commented unfavorably on Jack's deportment to Jack's mother.

"You are going to stay here some weeks, John," said the mother. "Suppose you try what you can do to improve your nephew. I give you full liberty. Please try to improve him."

Ten days later, Jack sought his mother with an anxious countenance: "How much longer is Uncle John going to be here?" he inquired.

"I don't exactly know," was the reply. "Why do you ask?" "Because I hope he's going soon. He's too forehanded for me."

"Aunt," remonstrated another child, "Why is it wrong

Joys of the Mother-Life

THREE joyful periods there are in mother-life. One is when the mother first holds in her arms her babe, and looks into its little face, her whole being flooded with a tide of rapture which words cannot express. No joy on earth is like the joy that brims the mother's cup in that exquisite hour, an hour that repays her to the full for the long months of waiting, and the agony of travail.

The years when the children are in the nursery are beautiful years. Mothers do not always realize, when they are busy with the innumerable steps and stitches, the thousand little cares and anxieties, how happy these years are. The children are under the mother's hand, to be guarded and guided, tucked up at night, and sent to school by day. The world has not claimed them; their sheltered world is in the home. From so many dangers mothers can shield them, in so many troubles mothers can comfort them, that the nursery era is the mother's own, where no sorrow can permanently intrude, so long as her children are spared. But the first abounding ecstasy is never surpassed. It was the rose-crowned day of youthful maternity.

Another period comes, when the mother and her children are half-way up life's morning road.

The lad is shooting fast into manhood; the girl will soon be a woman. Uninterested people see the youth encumbered with the awkwardness of the hobbledohy, bothered about the hands and feet that are far too big for his body, and assertive to a degree that provokes laughter. The mother may not be blind to the boy's defects, but she knows them as the chrysalis soon to be discarded, and with inexpressible pride and joy she beholds the coming man. The lad's father betrays irritation at the boy many a time, while the loving mother feels only elation.

Her daughter, too, thrills her with reminiscent gladness. The masses of abundant hair, the creamy complexion, the rose-tinted cheek, recall to her the glories of her own girlhood. She has been what her child is, and with a depth of sympathy no one but a mother can measure, she goes, mentally, to college with her little maid, and watches, mentally, with intense appreciation, the early dawnings of womanhood in her daughter. The first sweetheart belongs to her as fully as he does to her child, and he will be wise in his generation if he can but get her on his side.

A third day of calm and serene joy arrived for the mother, when she has reached middle age and, with a sort of awed wonder, holds her child's child in her arms. Most amazing it seems to her that God has so blessed her; that she sees the going on of her race; that she is greater than a mother, having achieved the dignity of a grandmother. Smile at her if you choose, but you do not smile, if you know for yourself. Verily, she may say reverently to the Master of the feast, "Thou hast kept the good wine until now."

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—BETTY. Oh, my dear, do crush out your disposition to jealousy. It will darken all your days.

—EVA. I hope the sale of cigarettes to boys under age may some day be prohibited by law. It ought to be.

—LUCY. A business office is not a drawing-room. You must be satisfied with ordinary courtesy from your associates.

—EDITH. There is no harm in a man carrying a parcel when walking with a young lady, if it is necessary for him to do so.

—WANDA. The germ theory is accepted universally, I believe. What we have to do is to look out for germs, and keep the bad ones out. When we are in good health, they cannot do us much harm. There is a moral analogy here.

—LINDA. The only thing to do, if you do not love your fiancé and do love another, is to be frank, and break your engagement.

—JOHN GEORGE. You have nothing to complain of. Can you expect a girl to care for you when you are rude and negligent by your own confession?

—W. B. S. In congratulating an engaged or newly-married couple, all that is necessary to say is, "I offer my congratulations," or "I wish you great happiness."

—MOTHER. Do not be in haste to tear away the veil of innocence from your child's mind. If, however, she asks questions that need an answer, you are the one to enlighten her.

—PERPLEXED MOTHER. I am afraid that you will have to be satisfied with the wife your son has chosen, and although you may not think her the very best one for him, yet if he truly loves her, the young lady will no doubt make him a good wife.

—F. V. R. Rubber plants are hardy, and, although they may lose their leaves through having been kept in too dry an atmosphere in the house, they will soon regain them when set out-of-doors for the summer. They should not be put in too sunny a place, and should be frequently watered.

—ELIZABETH MAC L. No one has a higher regard for the Scotch-Irish lineage than I. I think you have misunderstood something that I said. When I spoke of the bull-dog persistency of that line, I meant to compliment them. Such tenacity is splendid and heroic. But some men carry it too far in their homes.

TESSA AND HER DOVES

Tessa, little maid of Venice, has as yet no other loves; Sits and dreams, a happy-hearted, winsome child among the doves.

for me to leave my crusts, and right for you to leave yours?" The question was pertinent.

The Uses of Trial

We are very apt to fancy that trials have no use; that they are rude interruptions with which we might well dispense. But as the tree that struggles with the blast, bending and bowing, but striking deeper root, grows tough and strong, so the character that accepts the discipline of adversity, is thereby matured and ennobled. One who has never known trial, can newly be richly endowed with sympathy. A mother had lost her little one. She sat dumb and comforted, while friends spoke platitudes in her ear. In stepped a woman who had borne life's heat and storm. She put her arms around the mourner. "My dear," she said, "I know all about it. I have gone through it all. My children are on the other side." She had learned to say:

Christ, the Good Shepherd, cares for mine to-night,
And that is best.

But until she had learned it by sad experience, she could not comfort another in tribulation. Trial, is as the refiner's fire, and has the refiner's uses.

Jesus Teaches Humility

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

IN this lesson we see two contrasting pictures: 1. The folly of selfish ambition. 2. The glory of unselfish service. Both point us to one great central truth: "Office is opportunity." He who has been called to any office, should thank the electors, not for the "honor" but for the "opportunity," and should put service above salary.

A foreign missionary was, some time ago, addressing a large congregation. He noticed a boy intently listening, who seemed greatly interested. The earnest face of the little fellow led the missionary to say that even children might preach the Gospel in foreign lands, by their prayers and gifts now, and later in person. At the close of the address the boy pressed his way to the platform, and with eager face took the hand of the missionary. "Do you want to give something to the cause?" asked the missionary. "No, sir," replied the boy, "I was just wondering if you had any foreign stamps to give away." Our lesson presents a worse case, in which older people were involved. Jesus had just spoken with great solemnity of his approaching crucifixion and resurrection. Each time he foretold these events, his apostles seemed to think them but figurative intimations that a decisive battle and victory was at hand, by which he would enter upon his Messianic rule of the world, and so they debated forthwith with who should be premier, and who should have the other cabinet positions. This time James and John, cousins of Jesus, who, with Peter, had been his only companions on the Mount of Transfiguration, got their mother to ask for them the two highest cabinet positions. Is not this the very place to see the shallowness of selfish ambition, in the shadow of the Cross? They were not bad men, but how mean appears their desire for office for its own sake. Sought that they might be above others, not that they might serve others!

Office seeking is not in itself necessarily sinful or even selfish, although the proverb is a good one for both Church and State, that "the office should seek the man." Ambition, in the sense of aspiration, is not the enemy, but the yokefellow of contentment. Contentment without aspiration is not a blessing, but a curse, especially contentment with what we are. Even the command: "Be content with such things as ye have," does not excuse us for not striving in all proper ways, to "have" more, that we may be more useful. The thing pictured in this lesson, in contrast to Christ's self-sacrifice, to warn us against it as a mean and unworthy thing, is the desire for office or something else for the sake of getting above others. To want more money simply to have more than anybody or more than somebody; to desire to outshine others by a bigger house or a finer dress or a costlier equipage, this is an ambition as foolish as it is selfish; though it is, however, not only permissible but commendable to make the most of the capacities and opportunities God gives us. And when office comes to us it should not prompt pride, but a sense of mingled responsibility and thankfulness. If we are worthy of the office, it is not because of our own self-made merit, but because of what has come to us from God through our parents, our teachers and the age in which we live. What a chance for earnest thinking there is in the two groups of "self" words, the one expressing obedience to the divine command to love ourselves and our neighbor, egoism and altruism; the other expressing violations of that law:

Selfishness	Self-sacrifice
Self-confidence	Self-surrender
Self-conceit	Self-improvement
Self-indulgence	Self-denial
Self-debasement	Self-control
Self-destruction	Self-reverence
	Self-reliance
	Self-love

Motives are usually mixed, as is suggested by the allegory of a Christian worker, visited by an angel chemist, who tested his religious zeal and found it a full one hundred pounds, at which the worker was highly complimented, but the angel chemist proceeded to analyze it:

Bigotry	10 parts
Personal ambition	23 "
Love of praise	19 "
Pride of denomination	15 "
Pride of talent	14 "
Love of authority	12 "
Love to God, or Pure	4 "
Love to man, or Zeal	3 "

This analysis drove the worker to prayer, and though motives with him, as with us all, were always mixed, love to God and man thereafter dominated all other motives.

The folly of selfish ambition is illustrated by an incident from the State Capitol of Minnesota. A young lady had walked out on the skylight, over the Senate Chamber, and had written her name large, with the tip of her finger, in the dust that had accumulated there. A small boy saw the venturesome, foolish act, and thought he would write his name also in the dust; but he slipped and plunged through the glass, and was picked up, dead, on the stone floor, ninety-two feet below. Many a man has lost more than life, reputation and character, in an effort to write his name in dust. Good name has been sacrificed in obtaining religious as well as political offices. A noted professor used to try this experiment: Beneath the receiver of his air-pump he placed a sparrow, with sufficient air to sustain the sparrow's life for three hours. At the expiration of the first hour he introduced a second sparrow under the receiver, which immediately fell dead, while the other sparrow was able to survive in that atmosphere for another two hours. The reason was that the second sparrow, introduced at once out of a comparatively pure atmosphere into the vitiated air beneath the receiver, was immediately suffocated; whereas the other sparrow had become gradually accustomed to the presence of carbonic acid gas in the air he was respiring. So men in office do, without a twinge of conscience, things that would shock those whose consciences are untainted by the atmosphere of sinful compromise.

Prof. Bequerel, discoverer of the Bequerel rays of urani-

"JESUS SAID, WHAT I DO THOU KNOWEST NOT NOW, BUT THOU SHALT KNOW"

um, in a journey from Paris to London, carried in his vest-pocket a small tube of radium, to be used in a lecture. Nothing happened at the time, but, about a fortnight later, he observed that the skin under his pocket was beginning to redden and fall away, and finally a deep and painful sore formed there, and remained for weeks before healing. So a secret ambition to get some office for the mere gratification of pride—it maybe a church office or a social one—often eats into the vitals of our spiritual life.

On another occasion Jesus taught his office-seeking disciples by placing a child in their midst, and bidding them become as little children. That was exactly the spirit in which David and Solomon and Jeremiah accepted public office.

David, when king, said, "My soul is even as a weaned child." Solomon, newly crowned, said, "I am but a little child." Jeremiah exclaimed, when called to be a prophet, "I cannot speak, for I am a child." With these should go the famous story of the great Isaac Newton, who felt himself, amid world's applause, only a child on the seashore, with the ocean of truth yet before him. Thus humility ever accompanies true greatness.

Not to be ministered unto but to minister. That true greatness will put service above salary is the doctrine here taught, and this has become, in Christian lands, to a great degree, the social ideal, and, to a considerable extent, a social fact. Many a Christian mother, not only a father, also, lives under the law, "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister," in their relations to their households, yea, often in their relations to their neighbors. The professions are in theory under that and to a great degree in fact. We would not cross the street to hear a preacher whom we thought cared more for his salary than for divine service. Nor would we have in our houses a doctor who, we thought, cared more for his fee than for his patient's recovery. A teacher, too, is usually supposed to care more for the advancement of knowledge than for personal gain. In politics this theory appears in the titles we constantly use. Cabinet officers, as well as diplomats, are called "ministers," and even the President is spoken of as a "public servant." The spoils system, with its hogwash watchword, "What is therein for us?" is seldom defended openly. We might possibly elect a petty officer in spite of the feeling that to him salary was more than service, but certainly we would not elect a man President or Governor who was under that suspicion. We elect men to that office "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister." This is also the law of "society" in the narrowest sense, and when business has been brought under this Christian ideal, will be the law of society in the widest sense of the word.

A city missionary was calling on a lady who was in an English seaport when the door opened, and the woman's grown son entered, exclaiming, "I've got a ship." Seeing the company he closed the door, but not until the missionary had said, "I hope you've got your Captain on board." He reopened the door, saying, "I don't understand." The missionary explained at length, that he meant that Jesus Christ is the best Captain of our life. "Will you take him as your captain?" "Yes, but I don't know how."

"Well, you have just signed articles with your new Captain, I suppose? Will you sign this, 'I see myself to be a sinner, and I take the Lord Jesus to be my Saviour, believing that he died to save me, and for to-day I will take him as Captain of my life?'"

"That I will, but I can't write. I will sign my name and I will put my 'm' to it." And so he embarked on a Christian life.

We think of "ministry" too much in terms of oratory. The word means "service," and to such "ministry" we are all called. Mr. Spurgeon, while traveling in Italy, needed elder flower water as a medicine for one of the party; but not knowing the Italian word, tried in vain to make his wish known to the apothecary. The apothecary bethought him that he had seen elder trees in town, and going to them cut back with a bunch of blossoms, without a word got what he needed. Mr. Spurgeon, in using the incident for an illustration, made this application: "When you cannot tell what true religion is, exhibit it by your actions. Sign by your life what grace can effect. There is no language in the world so eloquent as a holy life. People may doubt what you say, but they will never doubt what you do."

And to give his life a ransom for many. The perfect antithesis of selfish ambition with which this lesson began is the self-sacrifice with which Jesus began; a self-sacrifice in which Jesus and John nobly followed their Master. Later years. Red Owl, a Sioux chief and orator, entered a mission schoolroom, and after looking earnestly at a picture of the Crucified, asked: "Who is this? Why are his hands bound? Why are those thorns on his head?" Earnestly the schoolmaster told the story. Red Owl was greatly touched by the love of the "Son of the Great Spirit," and came again and again to the mission to be told more about him. One morning, a few months later, good Bishop Whipple was going to Wabasha's village, on the open prairie he saw a newly-made grave. There was a plain wooden cross over it. He inquired whose it was. "Is that of Red Owl?" "Who put up this cross?" "His young men. When he was dying he said to them: 'That is the white men have brought to us is quite true. I have in my heart and it is good. When I am dead, bury me here, and put a cross over my grave, that the red men may ask why it is there. Then tell them what is in Red Owl's heart. Tell them who it was who died on the Cross.'"

The World's Oldest Legislator

REV. JOHN P. GERRIE

ONE hundred years of life and sixty-two years of legislative service, is a record unique and noteworthy. This is the proud distinction for the Honorable David Wark, L.L.D., Senator for the Dominion of Canada, who is designated on good authority as the world's oldest legislator. The centenary of his birth on February 19, was the occasion of many congratulations to the veteran, who, to-day, is hale and hearty, and will, probably before the appearance of this article, be at Ottawa for the regular session of the senate. The picture that appears herewith was taken after Mr. Wark entered his second century. A letter received by the writer, bearing the same date, is clear and distinct, and would do credit to a man many years younger than Mr. Wark. The autograph is quite firm and easily legible.

When twenty-one years of age, Mr. Wark came from Donegal, Ireland, his native place, to St. John, New Brunswick, in which Province his subsequent life has been largely spent. Teaching or office work was his aim; but finding no opening, he turned to the shipyards and at once secured employment. Later on, he found the place which he desired, as a teacher, and also, in time, became engaged in business. In both positions he was highly successful, and attention soon turned to him as a likely candidate for the Legislative Assembly of the Province, to which body he was elected in 1842. His next seat was in the Legislative Council, in 1851, where he remained until called to the Dominion Senate, in 1867. Of the seventy-two senators then appointed, only another, with Mr. Wark, is living to-day, while all his political associates of early days have passed away.

SENATOR WARK IN HIS SECOND CENTURY

A solitary sentinel of the past, he is yet a commanding figure of the present.

In Mr. Wark's legislative career, several matters stand out in marked prominence. One is the free trade between the Provinces, the initiative which he took as early as 1847, though the results were not achieved until two years later. Prior to this time Mr. Wark called attention to the condition of the schools, which were most inefficient, and the outcome of his efforts was a training school at Fredericton, the classification of teachers, and the appointment of inspectors.

But this great secret of Senator Wark's long and successful career is, I think, in his stance, upright, and consistent religious life. He removed to Richibucto some five years after coming to Canada, very largely that he might unite with his own communion, the Presbyterian Church, and soon opened a Sunday School, in which he served as superintendent for over forty years, resigning the position only on removing to Fredericton in 1872. In that city he at once identified himself with St. Paul's Presbyterian Church, and has been one of its most generous contributors and useful members. Home missions, temperance and the Bible Society have been among his chief concerns. That religion is prominent in his life and thought is apparent from a letter, by request, in the Toronto Globe on the occasion of his centenary, the concluding sentence of which reads: "I now ask my young readers to open their Bibles at the 25th chapter of Matthew, and read from the 31st verse to the end, and learn that, whether life is long or short, the important point is to be prepared for its end."

MY PRIMROSE

MY little primrose, gentle flower,
The darling of how many an hour,
When thou and I together gaze
In sheltered peace, on stormful days.

Around thee broods a quiet hush;
The faintest shadow of a blush,
That once hath stirred the vestal air
Is tranced upon thy petals fair.

Nor bird, nor butterfly, nor bee,
Hath ever whispered love to thee,
Nor sunbeam ventured to caress
Too bold, thy pure unconsciousness.

Why then, the dream of roseate glow
So tender on thy virgin snow,
Dost thou divine how dear thou art
White winter blossom, to my heart?

How, in thy dainty grace I see
A pledge of lovely things to be,
And wait, when thou hast had thy day
To walk, the flowery fields of May.

The wildwood treasures coy and sweet,
The bloom of gardens, and the fleet
Large rapture of the orchard's foam
When from the South the birds come home.

All these will say, what thou dost say
So softly to my soul this day:
"The Lord, who keeps his promises
Is near thee ever, near to bless."

No spoken word the Lord forgets,
The hour for leaf and bud he sets;
Who cares for fragile flower will be
A strong defense to thine and thee."

Smile on my little primrose flower,
And brighten many a lonesome hour.
Alike the Father's love we share,
And that great love is everywhere.

Rescue Work in St. Louis

Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, Founder and President of the Door of Hope, New York, is now engaged in a special preventive and rescue work among girls during the St. Louis World's Fair. Mrs. Whittemore has dedicated her life to the physical and spiritual well-being of those girls who need help to stem the tide of evil in the great cities. She has established sixty Homes in different parts of the country, and nearly four thousand girls have been cared for during the past thirteen years. The Mother Home is at Tappan, N. Y. All the work is supported by voluntary offerings. The Door of Hope at St. Louis has been in successful operation for some time past. Twenty-six more beds have just been presented for the temporary work that is to be undertaken during the Fair. The Door of Hope and many of its branches, in connection with other Homes, will be opened day and night to receive those who need its shelter and protection. Mrs. Whittemore will gladly answer any inquiries concerning this rescue work.

colloquial, his illustrations so personal and homely, that the thought would not be appreciated and the discourse would fall flat. For this reason, he put more energy than usual into his preaching, and, in spite of all its defects, he was conscious as he preached, that the sermon gripped his own soul tighter, and meant more to him than any he had preached for many a day.

At the close, he said:
"Brethren. I had a matter of business to present to you to-day. I have been feeling for some time that my work on this field is done. I had written my resignation, and had it in form to read to you to-day, but it was burned in the conflagration (the only big word he had used that morning) yesterday, and my mind has been so upset that I have not been able to write another, but I now—"

It was never known what Mr. Milton Shepherd intended to then do. At this point, Deacon Sharpe, Brother Mason, and Sister Dunn were all on their feet demanding recognition from the chair, while a dozen others were calling or motioning the minister to "set down."

Mr. Mason was recognized, and said:
"I move that Deacon Sharpe be chairman of this meeting."

Astonished and uncertain as to what was coming, the minister stepped down from the pulpit and moved toward the church door.

"Don't go out pastor," said the Deacon, "just set down and make yourself comfortable. Now, what has brother Mason, got to say?"

"No more than some of the rest of you will say. Only this—our pastor has been burnt out. I don't know how much insurance he had, but I know we ought to stand by him now and show him we appreciate him, and give him a little of that 'joy' he was talking about in his sermon.

And, by the way, that is the best sermon he's preached since he's been here. (It was the second Brother Mason had heard, though no one but the pastor thought of that.) Now I think we ought to make him a little present of a few hundred dollars, and I want to head the subscription with twenty-five."

The pastor arose as if to protest, but not being recognized by the chair, he retired amid the smiles of the congregation, and was followed from the room by Mrs. Shepherd and his son Charles.

Twenty years have passed since that Sunday, and Rev. Milton Shepherd is still pastor at Pleasant Valley. His sermons, which he has prepared fresh each week, and has not found time to write, and so could not read, are far inferior, from his own standpoint, to those preached to the cultured congregation at Montpelier, but Sister Dunn has not found them "slow," nor the young folks uninteresting. With the money given him after the fire, he started a new library; but for some reason, the old books of the previous generation were not the volumes to be placed upon his shelves. Most of them he could only find in second-hand stores, and, as he investigated, and came to understand the thought of the living men who were writing the new books, he found they were really sincere, and not so dangerous as he had imagined. Mr. Mason is now the Senior Deacon, and more than once he has been heard to say to some inquiring visitor: "Yes, our pastor's getting along; but let me tell you, stranger, he's strictly up-to-date. He may not swallow all the new notions as they come, but he knows what they are!"

So, take it all together, it still looks to every one, and to Rev. Milton Shepherd as well, as if Pleasant Valley is to be his last pastorate.

The Emperor and the Pilot

DURING Emperor William's journey along the Norwegian coasts last summer, in his yacht, the Hohenzollern, he is said to have surprised and pleased his old Norwegian pilot, Nordhuus, very much by talking to him in his native language. Two years ago, at the beginning of Nordhuus' experience as pilot on the Hohenzollern, he expected, as a result of his first trip, to be summarily dismissed from the Kaiser's service. Instead, he was made life-pilot to the Emperor, at a salary of 2,500 marks a year, and since has received many tokens of favor. The story is thus related by Fred B. Pitney:

The entrances to the Norwegian harbors are extremely narrow and tortuous. The whole peninsula is surrounded by islands and peaks of rocks jutting out of the water, and the channels often run so close to them that, standing on the deck of a ship, it seems that you could almost touch them by reaching out your hand. The Norwegians know these channels so well that they can run through them at high speed. Indeed, they become so expert, that in foggy weather they control the ship by the revolutions of the screw. The indicator on the bridge tells them how fast the engines are going, and, by counting the revolutions, they know when to put the wheel over. Round invisible cliffs and pointed rocks the pilots whirl the ships without a tremor, when the variation of a hair's breadth, almost, would tear the bottom out of the vessel and sink her with all she carried.

The entrance of the harbor of Odda is especially dangerous, and Nordhuus, on his first trip on the yacht, was carrying the Hohenzollern in at half speed, when the Emperor came on the bridge in one of his fits of impatience and ordered everybody below, declaring that they did not know how to handle a ship, they were a set of cowards for running so slowly, and he was going to take charge of the vessel himself. The German officers promptly obeyed, though they expected in a few minutes to be struggling in the sea, but Nordhuus stood solidly at his post, ceaselessly shifting the wheel.

He is a man of medium height, with the fair hair of the Norwegian type, wearing a yellow beard, and having the bold, strong features of his Viking ancestors. The Emperor strode across the bridge, and rang the bell for full speed ahead, at the same time putting out his other hand to take the wheel. Nordhuus placed himself in the way, and, leaning over the wheel, called down the tube to the engine-room, "Half speed. Never mind the bell!"

"You countermand my orders!" cried the Emperor, giving the bell another jerk.

"Disregard the bell!" called Nordhuus through the tube, unmoved.

The Emperor glared at the pilot, and then said, majestically: "Go below, and report yourself under arrest."

"Leave the bridge!" responded Nordhuus, grimly, grasping the wheel more firmly. "This ship is in my charge, and I'll have no interference with my orders, from king or seaman!"

The officers on the deck hurried silently aft, wishing well to the pilot. Nordhuus stood at his post, unshaken by threats, unheeding commands, and carrying the royal yacht safely into the harbor. Next day, the Emperor decorated the sturdy pilot with one of the lower grades of the Order of the Black Eagle, and made him his life-pilot.

Burning the Church Mortgage

THE members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, North Highland Avenue, Pittsburg, held a reception in the Auditorium, Thursday evening, March 31, and invited a number of friends to witness the burning of the church mortgage, which has been a burden since 1887. Rev. Dr. D. C. Martin, the pastor, presided. Mr. William Blair gave a report of the purchase and payment on the church property. R. A. M. Steele, Treasurer of the Board of Deacons, reported that the congregation, since he has been treasurer, contributed to various schemes of the church, besides the pastor's salary, $34,000. J. C. Calderwood, Clerk of Sessions, read a brief history of the congregation. The present pastor, Dr. Martin, was called in 1895, and under his financial management and the liberality of his wife, the debt of over $16,000 has been wiped out.

The burning of the mortgage was the feature of the meeting. Mrs. Martin was called to the platform, and while she held the mortgage, the match was applied by Deacon J. F. Steele. A number of ministers, who were present by invitation, made brief addresses. The list of speakers included Rev. Dr. D. B. Wilson, Rev. Dr. R. J. George, Rev. Dr. J. W. Sproull, Rev. Dr. McAllister, Dr. R. C. Wylie, Dr. W. J. Coleman, Rev. Dr. B. M. Sharp. Dr. H. H. George, a former pastor of the church, spoke of the trials and struggles through which the congregation had passed, and the courage of conviction displayed by the little remnant, when, deserted and excluded from their house of worship, they stood firmly and fought bravely until it was recovered in the courts.

After the addresses, refreshments were served by the ladies.

IN AN OLD TRUNK
Bay Finds a Bottle of Carbolic Acid and Drinks it.

While the mother was unpacking an old trunk a little 18 months old baby gazed at a bottle of carbolic acid while playing on the floor and his stomach was so badly burned it was feared he would not live for he could not eat ordinary foods. The mother says in telling of the case:

It was all two doctors could do to save him as he burnt his throat and stomach so badly that for two months after he took the food nothing would lay on his stomach. Finally I took him into the country and tried new milk and that was no better for him. His Grandma finally suggested Grape-Nuts and I am thankful I adopted the food for he commenced to eat better right away and would not eat anything else. He commenced to get fleshy and his cheeks like red roses and now he is entirely well.

I took him to Motomoras on a visit and every place we went to stay to eat he called for Grape-Nuts and I would have to explain how he came to call for it, it was his main food.

The names of the physicians who attended the baby are Dr. Eddy of this town and Dr. Geo. Gale of Newport O., and anyone can write to me or to them and learn what Grape-Nuts food will do for children and grown-ups too." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Methodists in Conference

NOT only members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but Christians of all denominations, have an interest in the Quadrennial General Conference now in session at Los Angeles, Calif. What that Conference is doing and will do, will be felt during the next four years in every section of our land, and will have an effect on other churches. The spectacle of a great legislative body engaged in perfecting the organization of that world-wide church, in rendering its methods and agencies still more effective in propagating the Gospel, and adapting them to the changed conditions of Twentieth Century life, is most impressive, and if it acts with its customary prudence, it will set an example of wise administration, which will have its influence on the whole Christian Church.

The chief sessions are held in Hazard's Pavilion, which has been expressly modeled for the purpose. It seats three thousand persons, and additional accommodation for overflow meetings is furnished by the First Methodist Church, the German Methodist Church, and the Temple Baptist Church, which are near at hand. The number of delegates is 742, which is twenty-eight more than were in the General Conference of 1900. Of these, 562 are sitting in General Conference for the first time. Forty-two delegates come from foreign lands, representing the results of the missionary work of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The sessions commenced on May 4, and will continue to near the close of the month.

One of the most interesting sessions, which will have been held by the time this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in the hands of its readers, will be that at which Bishop Cyrus D. Foss will read the address of the bishops, giving a resume of the work of the Church during the past four years, a survey of present conditions, and suggestions on the problems to come under the consideration of the Conference. This address is always eagerly anticipated, as giving expression to the deliberate opinions of the bishops.

To many of the delegates, however, and to churches throughout this and missionary lands, the most important sessions will be those at which the officers will be elected. There will be several bishops elected. How many is not known, and will not be known until the Conference itself decides. It is evident that besides filling the vacancies caused by death since the General Conference, the growth of the Church requires an increase in the number of bishops. In 1900, the Conference thought that nineteen bishops, two of whom were on the retired list, were sufficient; but it is fully expected that this Conference will add to the number. Probably, too, some of the present bishops will be retired, on account of age or infirmity. Besides this, there is a suggestion that the number of missionary bishops should be increased. More are needed in India, and a recommendation has been made that one each should be provided for China, Japan and Korea, and, it has been suggested, that the interests of the Church in South America, require a bishop for that field.

In addition to the bishops there will be elections of the editors of the Christian Advocates, the publishing agents, and the Secretaries of the various Boards, including Home and Foreign Missions.

Of the problems to be discussed some pertain to administration. It is, for example, proposed to amalgamate the publishing houses of the East and West, a proposal which is sure to be opposed. Another proposal is to bring the various Boards of Missions, Sunday Schools and Education into one organization, having the power of pro rata distribution of income. This also has zealous opponents. The time limit on the length of pastorates, which was abolished by the last General Conference, still has its zealous advocates, and there are suggestions that it be restored. The opinion of the majority, however, appears to be that a further experiment of four years is needed to properly test the working of the new system. A more efficient system of providing an income for superannuated ministers is also needed, and that will probably be devised by the Conference. The question of amusements will be certain to involve an earnest debate. The present rule strictly forbids dancing, playing at games of chance, attending the theatre, the circus and horse races. Requests have been made for a modification of this rule, or at least that it be made advisory rather than mandatory. These are but a few of the problems to be considered; but these will test the sagacity, as well as the temper of the delegates.

Pentecost

How the Promise of the Holy Spirit was Fulfilled

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER his resurrection, our beloved Lord "showed himself alive . . . by many infallible proofs, being seen of them [the apostles whom he had chosen] forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." On the evening of the resurrection day, he had appeared to them. They were terrified and affrighted. There was no longer amongst them the spirit which led Peter to say, "Lo, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" (Matt. 20: 27). Under the terrible disappointment of the judgment, execution, death, and burial of him on whom they had counted as the Messiah and Deliverer of Israel, the faith of every one of them had given way; they had all forsaken him and fled. And now he was risen, and they were put to shame, by this proof of his divinity.

Only by divine power can any man live a divine life. We must be made partakers of the divine nature (II. Pet. 1: 4) to walk in this world as Christ walked. Only by the Holy Ghost, working in us, can we will and do God's good pleasure (Phil. 2: 13). Therefore it was that the disciples tarried in Jerusalem, and "were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God," for the promise of the Father for which they were waiting.

The disciples knew what to expect; their Lord had said to them, "Ye shall receive power after that [or, when, R.V.] the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth" (Acts 1: 8). And now, after ten days' waiting, but waiting in the fullest assurance that it was not in vain, the day of Pentecost dawned.

Every Pentecost, up to that time (Lev. 23: 10, 11, 15-21) had been but a type of the ingathering that should be made that day. The little band of a hundred and twenty were "all together in one place." And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing, mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting; and there appeared unto them cloven tongues [tongues parting asunder, R.V.], like as of fire; and it sat upon each of them." When God manifested himself to Elijah on Horeb, "the Lord was not in the wind," and "not in the fire," and now was God the Holy Ghost in the wind, or was it the precursor of his presence?

The Holy Spirit is compared to the wind (John 3: 8; Ezek. 37: 9). The presence of the Lord as fire is very constant in the Old Testament. The Shekinah glory, in the wilderness and in the temple, was always as fire in the night season. The true Light which makes his true Church the light of the world is God dwelling in his people and making our bodies his temple. As a people filled with the Holy Ghost, true believers should be a Holy of Holies upon earth, shedding forth the light of God upon a lost world.

"They were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." It was really not they that spoke, but the Spirit of their Father who spoke in them (Matt. 10: 20). It was not Peter who preached that wonderful sermon, or the hundred and twenty disciples who spoke, in different languages, the wonderful works of God; it was the Holy Ghost in them, inspiring their thoughts and using their tongues. They were willing to be instruments only, used by God.

NECESSARY

Pole May Go Without Food for Days, but Not Without Sleep.

asters have gone without food for many days at a time, but no one can go without sleep. "For a long time I have not been sleeping well, often lying awake two or three hours during the night, up to three weeks ago, but now I sleep sound every night, and wake up refreshed and vigorous," says a California woman.

Do you know why? It's because I used to drink coffee, but three weeks ago I cut off the coffee and began using Postum. Twice since then I have drunk coffee, and both times I passed a sleepless night, and so I am doubly convinced coffee has caused the trouble and Postum remedied it.

My brother has been in the habit of drinking coffee three times a day. He has been troubled with sour stomach and I then would notice him getting soda from the can to relieve the distress in his stomach; lately hardly a day passed without a dose of soda for relief.

About two weeks ago he asked me for a cup of Postum—said he liked it well enough to give up coffee, and since then has been drinking Postum three times a day, and says he has not once been troubled with sour stomach. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Even after this lady's experience with coffee, her brother did not suspect coffee was causing his sour stomach, but easily persuaded it.

Coffee is not suspected in thousands of cases just like this, but it's easily proved. A few days' trial works wonders, and of course "there's a reason."

A Wayside Shrine in China

THE work of spreading the Christian religion in China has a vast number of difficulties to contend with. There may be hostile governors, stirring up the people and the secret societies; or it may be the spontaneous hostility of village headmen. Not only are there four or five distinct great religions in China, but there are also such impenetrable barriers as ancestral worship, and varied and miscellaneous superstitions. This last phase is illustrated in the accompanying photograph, which shows a shrine at the foot of a sacred tree by the wayside, in China. The main part of the shrine appears to be (and probably is), formed out of an old stove; and that the place is regarded as "sacred," is apparent from the inscriptions and pieces of rag hung about the trunk. These scraps of rag represent "diseases" that have been accommodatedly received by the shrine; whilst the inscriptions are of the most pious order. In the stove is most probably burned every available scrap of written matter; for the written word, as in most Oriental countries, is peculiarly sacred; and the literate classes naturally do their best to encourage this semi-adoration of knowledge on the part of the lower order.

Macedonian Relief Work

In a letter from Treasurer W. W. Peet, of the American Board in Constantinople, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer, after acknowledging receipt of the final remittance of $7,000 from the relief fund contributed by the readers of this journal, for the Macedonian refugees, adds: "I will hold the money for the present at the disposal of Rev. Geo. D. Marsh, for whom I am negotiating with the British Ambassador, in regard to securing from the Sultan, some suitable guarantees under which the refugees in Bulgaria can return to their homes, and the men of the families, now in prison, can be released on good behavior, with immunity from further arrest."

Negotiations for a general amnesty have been in progress. A general amnesty has been signed between Bulgaria and Turkey. It is quite fitting that we should lend a hand in the work of establishing the refugees in their homes and former localities, under the Sultan's amnesty and the programme inaugurated by the Powers, and to this work Dr. and Mrs. Marsh will be ready to devote considerable time, whenever the conditions are ripe to admit of making a beginning.

Contributors to the relief fund will be gratified to know that they have not only aided materially in relieving the acute suffering among the refugees, during the most trying period, but also, as Dr. Peet's letter shows, that their gifts will be the means of restoring many poor Macedonian families to their former homes, and giving them a new start in life under auspices which we may hope will prove better than any they have known for many years.

A Railroad Man on Temperance

Dear Editor:—I write this to encourage you in the bold and fearless stand taken against alcohol and other drinks, that are dragging down the best youth of our land. When we think of the one hundred thousand young men that are taken yearly to supply this monster, and see the wrecked and ruined homes, and mothers on their bended knees, praying for their wayward boys; the wives mistreated and slain by this demon; the little children barefooted, bareheaded, ragged and dirty on the street begging for bread, it is time now that every Christian should stand firm against this accursed traffic in liquor. True and False Ambition

A Quality Essential to Manliness, but Liable to Abuse

WHEN we speak of a man having no ambition, we say of him, one of the most hopeless things we can say about him. A man without ambition is a lifeless man, useless to himself and to society. He must have ambition if he is to be of any value. The lazy, careless, indifferent man, who does his work perfunctorily, who is always glad when closing time comes, and counts the days to vacation, whose work has to be always examined to see that he has not done it in a slipshod fashion, and who never cares to do more, or better than he is compelled to do—that man is a burden to himself, and is likely to end in being a burden on society.

Like every other useful quality, however, ambition is liable to become mischievous. It may become a craving for wealth or place and power, and so ardent a craving that a man is willing to sacrifice to its attainment principles more vital to his well-being than would be any of the objects at which he aims. It is liable, too, to lead to his jealousy and envy of others, to a fierce selfishness, which, carried to an extreme, puts an obstacle in the path of a rival and grudges a competitor his success. It may cause a man to become discontented with honest work and prompt him to resort to trickery to advance his reputation or his wealth. It is the fire which we need to produce steam and to supply power, but which, when it passes beyond control, consumes all within its reach.

True ambition leads a man to make the utmost of his powers. It prompts him to attain self-control. It stimulates him to get knowledge and to develop his skill. It leads him, above all, to render service to humanity. He wants to be a useful man. It is not distinction that he seeks, but to be worthy of distinction. Dignity, honors, titles, emoluments, are not the objects of true ambition, but to possess the qualities and render the services for which those things are conferred. If he seeks high place, it is not for the salary attached to it, nor for the honor of holding it, but for the opportunity it affords of doing good. There is no way to abiding fame but that of service.

Whoever will be great. Mr. Moody used to tell a story of a man who was always trying to occupy the highest places and neglected the work that properly belonged to him. One night he dreamed that he saw a beautiful temple, grand in its proportions and excellent in its material. It was finished from foundation to cupola except in one place, where a stone was missing. It was a blot on the whole building and disfigured it. That one missing stone was needed to make the temple perfect. While he was considering the blemish, an angel appeared, of whom he asked how it was that the temple was so disfigured. The angel replied, "That stone was yours. It was left for you to put it in its place, but you were always so anxious to do great and conspicuous things, that you had a contempt for such work as this. The temple would have been finished if you had done your humble duty."

They that are great exercise authority. At the close of the first session of a convention summoned to inaugurate a useful, moral and religious movement, a shrewd, quiet pastor was requested to offer prayer. He had watched the proceedings, and noticed that the time which should have been given to organizing the work had been devoted to questions of precedence and of the offices. In his prayer he asked God to send men to their help who would care more about the ark and less about the choice of the man who should drive the oxen.

It shall not be so among you. A young student in college asked the president of the institution, a learned and good man, what he would advise him to strive for in life. "Riches and honors," was the reply, "if you mean to be satisfied with earth; but the Christian graces if you are looking to eternity."

"THE STRANGER'S FRIEND"

THE Rev. Enoch Hall, pastor of the English Reformed Church (Congregational) in Hamburg, Germany, is engaged in an interesting missionary work among the foreign seamen in that port. Mr. Hall is a very efficient musician, and music, vocal and instrumental, forms an attractive part of the service. In this he is ably assisted by his wife, who is also a fine musician. Mr. Hall never spares himself in his good work. He has conducted successful missions for several churches—a branch of service he is always glad to render, for the joy it gives him in thus serving his Master. The position he has now held for nearly three years of pastor of the Hamburg Church, has won for him the title of "the Fisherman's and Stranger's Friend."

Seamen and others are often stranded in Hamburg, and they need a good Samaritan to look after them and help them in their troubles. Frequently young men thus placed speak no word of German. They seek the assistance of the English pastor. "We gather our congregations," says Mr. Hall, "from the British and American residents of Hamburg, the sailors who frequent the port, Germans who want to learn the language, and from the English-speaking people who come to the Continent."

During the last three years the church has had visitors from many parts of the United States, Canada, West Indies, South America, Turkey, Syria, Armenia, Africa, England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. Two services are regularly held on Sunday. Evening services are not popular, even with the State churches, on the Continent. Shops and places of business are open part of the Lord's day. With the public-houses, beer-gardens, and theatres in full swing, Continental cities present a far different Sabbath from that of England or America. To offset these Sabbath-breaking influences is a part of the mission of Mr. Hall, and his audiences appreciate the opportunity for worship amid so much that is irreligious in their surroundings.

Tolstoi on Civilization

In a recent interview, Count Tolstoi expressed himself very frankly concerning the so-called "superior civilization" of Europe. He said: "Why should I place exclusively civilization in Europe? Is it because the Europeans have created for themselves artificial needs and because they have invented the railway, the telegraph and the telephone? To me all those acquisitions of so-called civilization seem to be the inventions of barbarism. They serve and pander to all that is basest in man. I fail to see that they confer on him any sort of moral superiority, while I perceive, on the other hand, that the use he makes of his intelligence is most often for evil, not good. Civilization provides labor-saving machinery. Oh, yes, they save work; but work is good and healthy. Work is excellent, agreeable and amusing. It is not work which must be abolished, but the appetites which must be subdued. Modern inventions, by developing the appetites, perpetuate labor. No, it is not by modern inventions that the development of the human mind must be judged."

A Wonderful Cow

Several tests, made under the supervision of Prof. E. B. Voorhees of the agricultural experimental station at New Brunswick, N. J., have proved that H. D. Roe, of Augusta, N. J., has a Holstein cow which holds the world's record for producing milk. The record shows that in seven days the cow gave 620.95 pounds of milk and 26.87 pounds of butter fat, which produced 34.32 pounds of butter. The record for 30 days is 2,640 pounds of milk, 110 1-10 pounds of butter fat, making 137 6-10 pounds of butter. The cow is named Aggie Cornucopia Pauline, and has been valued by the Holstein-Friesian Breeders' Association at $10,000. For the tests, the cow was milked four times each day.

I SELL REAL ESTATE

No matter what it is, worth or in what town, city, state or territory it is located.

When I tell you that I can sell real estate for cash, I don't mean that I can sell a property for $10,000 that is worth only $5,000. I don't mean that I can sell an old, run-down property to a person who wants to buy a modern, up-to-date home. I can't perform miracles. I can't do anything magical. I mean that I can do just what I have been doing for over eight years—selling all kinds of real estate mail parts of the country at

GOOD, FAIR PRICES

If you want to sell your property (no matter what it is worth or where it is located) and are willing to accept a reasonable price, then I want to handle it for you. If you are asking a higher price than any reasonable person could be expected to pay, I don't want to touch the property.

I have offices in principal cities from Boston to San Francisco. I have hundreds of representatives throughout the country. I am spending over $100,000 a year for the purpose of bringing the man who wants to buy in communication with the man who wants to sell. I am certainly able to judge the merits of your property. I want you to send me a description of your property, including your lowest cash price, and if you will do this I will write you a letter of advice telling you about the market for this kind of property, and giving you the best method for making a quick cash sale.

DO IT TO-DAY

If you want to buy any kind of a property in any part of the country, tell me just what you want. The magnitude of my business enables me to offer you many advantages which no other broker can possibly offer. I believe I can fill your requirements very promptly and save you some money at the same time.

Avoid Speculation! Invest in Land!

EVERY reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD naturally avoids speculation. Invest your money in first-class farming land in a new country. Place it where it is absolutely safe, and will return to you large profits. The Upper Peninsula of Michigan is rapidly filling up with settlers, land values are increasing, and land purchased of us for from $5 to $10 per acre, will be worth from $20 to $50 per acre in a few years. Our land is located close to good markets, towns, and railroads, and raises all farm products, including the finest strawberries, apples, and sugar beets. We are selling it to investors for $10 down, and $10 per month.

If you want to make a sound investment, if you want to own a good farm which you can sell at a good profit next year, write us for full particulars and look us up carefully. Write each one of the banks we give as references. Write us to-day.

Questions & Answers

Correspondents are asked to remember that we cannot examine poetry for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and that we cannot return such MSS. when unsolicited.

R. A. M. C. R. A. C. In Marie Corelli's Romance of Two Worlds is contained a statement that Joseph was married to a wedded Mary, and had a large family by this previous marriage. In Ben Hur, chapter 8, Joseph is represented as stating that Mary is his niece. Is there any authority in tradition or history for these statements? Does the Bible anywhere substantiate them?

There are many traditions concerning Joseph, the foster-father of the Saviour. One that is generally accepted by early Christian writers is that he was quite old when espoused to Mary, and had by a previous marriage four sons and two daughters. Epiphanius mentions this, and Theophylact and Eusebius give further detail, and state that Joseph's wife was the widow of his brother Cleophas, who died without issue, Joseph marrying her according to the old Jewish law. Nicephorus gives Salome as the name of Joseph's first wife. The origin of all these assertions by the early fathers is found in the apocryphal gospels, and particularly in the Protevangelium of St. James, which is supposed to have been written by a Christian Jew in the second century, and which is referred to by Origen, Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr in their writings. The Bible gives nothing of them. It should be added that Jerome, and several other eminent authorities, hold that "our Lord's brethren" referred to in the Gospels were his cousins, and that Joseph was not married before his espousal to Mary.

Mrs. E. S. J. Kansas City, Mo. What became of the disciples?

According to the traditions, Matthew was martyred in Ethiopia, Mark in Alexandria and Luke in Greece; John died a natural death at Ephesus; James the Great was beheaded at Jerusalem; Peter crucified in Rome; James the Less beaten to death; Philip hanged at Hierapolis, Phrygia; Thomas killed at Coromandel, East Indies; Bartholomew flayed alive; Jude slain with arrows; Simon (Zelotes) crucified in Persia; Andrew crucified; Matthias beheaded; Barnabas stoned to death; Paul beheaded at Rome.

J. L. C., Jefferson, Mont. Russia has declared, quite lately, that she will tolerate no interference and accept no mediation in the war with Japan. The Hague Tribunal has no power to stop or prevent war unless both the parties to the dispute are willing to submit to its arbitration. You are quite right, however, in assuming that the present war might have been averted.

Julius K., Jackson, Mich. Can you refer me to some book that treats of the construction of telephones and telephone lines, dynamo, bells, batteries, etc.?

The editor of the American Inventor, New York City, informs us that the best books on the subject are American Telephone Practice, by K. B. Miller, published by McGraw & Co., New York City, and Telephone Troubles and How to Find Them, W. H. Hyde & Co., Milwaukee, Wis.

M. L., Atlanta, Ga. It has frequently seemed to me that my prayers are vain and that God does not hear them. Yet I am a believer in Christianity. Can you enlighten me?

This is an experience which comes to most of us at times. If we pray amiss—that is, if we ask for mere material blessings, and they are denied us, we conclude that our prayers have passed unheeded. But our Father, in his wisdom, knows better than we can possibly know whether what we ask would be for our hurt or our benefit, and as an earthly father may refuse the foolish request of a child, so He may withhold what we desire, since it would be wrong to grant it. Read the article on the subject on another page of this issue.

Mrs. S. T. A., New York, N. Y. What is an "ikon"?

An ikon is an image or images to which miraculous powers are attributed. One of these represents the Virgin Mother, bearing an image of Christ, with archangels on either side, and God the Father above, saying, "There can be but one flock and one Shepherd." An ikon in the Russian navy has recently shown the Empress one of these "miraculous" images of the Virgin, which the Russians fervently hope is going to turn the tide of battle in their favor.

A. D. B., Galton, Ill. 1. In Acts 4:12 Peter says, "Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we may be saved." Does this infer that people who have never had opportunity to hear of Jesus are lost, if they die in their ignorance? 2. God never does that which is not good. This being a fact, why did Jesus tell his disciples to ask God to "Lead us not into temptation?" What was our Saviour's meaning?

1. The apostle clearly had reference only to those whom he was addressing. He desired to confine these rulers of Israel to Jesus for tries, the majority, however, being British subjects, and the refusal of the Transvaal government to give them the franchise became the source of much trouble, finally bringing about the Boer-English war.

K. F. B., Lititz, Pa. 1. After the Crucifixion, what became of the crown of thorns? 2. Why did Abraham take Lot along when he went out of the land of Haran into the land of Canaan? 3. Why do so many churches drop the practice of foot-washing? Is it not a command of God?

1. There is no authentic record of its preservation, although the Roman Church has certain traditions concerning it, and some ancient churches even show alleged pieces of the thorny crown. 2. Abraham at that time had no son of his own, and, as Josephus, the Roman Churches, and the Church of England has such a ceremony once a year. The Baptists, Mennonites, and a few other sects also observe the custom at certain periods. The only explanation of its disuse is that being peculiarly applicable to Eastern climatic conditions, the West has allowed it to be neglected.

Leslie K., Waterbury, Conn. What was the origin of the expression "Solid South"?

It was first employed by Col. John S. Mosby in a letter to the New York Herald, advocating the election of R. B. Hayes.

Subscriber, Colorado Springs, Colo. What did Christ refer to when he asked Peter (John 15) whether he loved him "more than these?"

Peter had made himself conspicuous by his protestations of affection, as when he had said (Mark 14:29), "Although all should offend, yet will not I." The form in which Christ put the question would appear to imply a delicate reminder of Peter's boast. Did indeed love Christ more than did the other disciples? When Peter again avowed his love, Christ gave him a new commission: feed or shepherd the sheep and lambs. commission not of authority, but of service.

Miss S., New York. Why was Rome called "The Eternal City?"

The phrase is from Virgil, who, in the Aeneid (1:79), makes Jupiter tell Venus that he would give to the Romans imperium sine fine (an eternal empire).

E. L. D., New York City. 1. Why is the question raised as to the authenticity of John's Gospel? Has it any foundation in fact? 2. How is it that the miracle of the raising of Lazarus is not recorded by any other Evangelist?

1. The reason generally assigned by those who dispute its authenticity, is the difference in style between the Gospel and the Revelation. This difference is perceptible even in the English translation. The language of the Gospel is that of a refined scholar, while that of the Revelation is the writing of a less cultured man. The discussion on the subject, however, has led the majority of critics to believe that John was the author of both. It is worthy of note, too, that a writer of the year A. D. 175, declares that the Gospel was written by John. Irenaeus, who died about 200 and who was a disciple of Polycarp, who was a pupil of John, also ascribes it to the Apostle. We cannot conceive of better evidence than that of Irenaeus. 2. None of the Evangelists profess to give a complete biography of Christ. Indeed there is little in them that is repeated by John. There is now no clue to the reasons which guided them in their selection, and we cannot tell why they omitted some miracles, while recording others.

Emmeline D., Babylon, N. Y. What are the statistics regarding the defective classes throughout our country at the present time?

According to the last census, the total insane in the United States were 106,485; feeble-minded, 95,609; deaf and dumb, 40,592; blind, 50,568.

More than fifty years ago, in Barre, Mass. we had two large flourishing trees bearing seedless apples each year, that were fine for cooking and eating. The trees never blossomed; we called them the "Neverblooms." This was done in the budding. We have eaten apples, part of which were sour and part sweet, by a process in grafting.

Edward D., Sandusky. No; the cultivation of ginseng is not by any means a wise or profitable thing for the farmer. Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, states that if not more than one dozen persons in the United States were to seriously take up ginseng culture, they would glut the market. China has imported from the United States in five years only 172,000 pounds and this whole amount could be raised in a field of fifty or seventy-five acres.

TWO weeks ago we announced that of our large edition of the CROWN ENCYCLOPEDIA, nine hundred sets were slightly damaged—that is some sets were scratched or rubbed, although almost imperceptibly so—while others had been misaddressed, and were returned by the express companies as undeliverable. These sets are not much hurt, but we cannot send them out again as new.

The insides are perfect in every respect, and the damage to the covers in no case exceeds the ordinary wear and tear incident to a single month's use. (These sets, neatly packed, we will sell at ONE DOLLAR, charges collect at your end, or at $1.50, delivered free.) If you live at a great distance from New York, you will do better to send us $1.50 and let us prepay the charges, but if you live nearby, you can save money by sending us only $1.00 and paying express charges on delivery of goods. The set weighs seven pounds.

Over 700 sets have already been sold, and the balance will go within a few days. You must act quickly if you wish to benefit by this offer. To-day is better than to-morrow, as to-morrow may be too late. Your money will be refunded should the supply be exhausted before your order reaches us.

Three Masterpieces of Modern Art Given FREE

A TRIAL subscription for only two months is quite sufficient to convince a family not now taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of its superiority as an all-round, instructive, entertaining, and highly edifying, family weekly. We are so sure of this, and so certain that any family once taking the paper will want to continue it, that in order to induce such trial subscriptions, we make the following extraordinarily generous proposition:

To any one not now on our books, and not intending to take the place of any one now on our books, who will subscribe for nine weeks, at the trifling expense of 25 cents, we will send three beautiful pictures, each measuring 11 x 15 inches, and all superbly printed in 15 beautiful colors, reproducing with absolute fidelity the striking effect of three masterpieces of modern art.

Here is an opportunity to do good and get good, and we hope that it will result in adding many thousands of names to our present list. Let all friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the glorious cause which it represents, be up and doing, and scour the neighborhood in which they live for new subscribers to be added to the list of the brightest and best family paper in the wide, wide world.

There is little doubt that the translation "lead" or "bring us not into temptation" is defective, and does not render the true meaning, which would seem to be, "Suffer us not to be led into temptation." THE NEW BANK AT BROWNSVILLE

IN THE HEART OF THE NEW GHETTO, AT BROWNSVILLE

THE BATHS AND EDUCATION BUILDING

OUR NEW JEWISH GHETTO

In recent years, the lower East Side of New York, has become the scene of the greatest Jewish Ghetto in the world. There are in the metropolis nearly 600,000 Hebrews, a very large proportion of them being massed in the Ghetto district, where they are housed in the poorer class of tenements and huddled together more densely than in any of the Old World cities.

Within a very recent period, great changes have begun in the congested Ghetto. High rents and cramped and unsanitary surroundings, have driven the Hebrew sellers in the East Side tenements to look for other quarters. Across the East River, in Brownsville, a suburb of the Eastern District of Brooklyn, a new Ghetto has sprung into existence. Its growth has been almost magical. For many weeks past, an exodus of such proportions as New York has never witnessed before has been under way. Every day a long procession of "moving vans," loaded with the belongings of Jewish families, and the furnishings of innumerable little stores and workshops, crosses the river to the new "promised land," where lower rents and more healthful and pleasant surroundings are proving irresistible attractions. Many thousands of Jewish families have already left the old Ghetto for the new, and it can be foreseen that quickly scent large profits, find difficulty in buying any land in this district.

The new Williamsburgh Bridge has been a potent factor in the rapid upbuilding of this Jewish community, and the high and ever-increasing rents on the Manhattan side of the river have been the immediate cause of the remarkable exodus. Statisticians have pronounced the old Ghetto in New York the most densely populated quarter of any city in the world. The famous Ghetto of London has only one-third as many residents, and Paris and Berlin have each still smaller number. Many of the Hebrews in the New York Ghetto come are insufficient to accommodate them. With the exception of a few public buildings, most of the structures are glaringly new; but they have the merit of being fresh and clean, and the streets are wide. Another advantage is that the buildings are seldom more than three stories in height. Naturally, with such a demand, rents in Brownsville are rising, and those fortunate enough to have houses or stores to rent are in a fair way ultimately to emulate the landlords on the other side of the river.

Brownsville has already taken on many of the characteristics of the old Ghetto. Business enterprises flourish there, and "push-cart" merchants are plentiful. Men and women crowd the sidewalks, and bargain in the same way as they were wont to do in Hester and Rivington streets. "Kosher" meats are for sale in the butcher shops, and quaint Hebrew signs are visible everywhere. Yiddish is the language almost universally spoken. There are now six synagogues, and many more are planned. There is a Hebrew Educational Society, and many Jewish clubs and other associations. Hebrews are very social among themselves, and when a young man marries, almost the first thing he does after setting up his home is to join some lodge or society, which will be of benefit to himself and family, should accident or sickness incapacitate him at any time. There is nothing improvident in the Jewish make-up, and a Hebrew, therefore, seldom becomes an object of charity, be he young or old; but when there comes an appeal for help for the sick and unfortunate, it is responded to as quickly and generously as circumstances will admit.

There is little likelihood that the older community will suffer any perceptible decrease in population, as large numbers of Jewish immigrants are constantly arriving. Oppressed in other lands, they flee to America as a haven where, under a liberal government and with a race tolerance unknown elsewhere, they can live in peace and security, free from tyranny, and protected from the ceaseless persecutions and bigotry which have made the sons and daughters of Israel the wanderers of the world.

from Russia. In round numbers, there are 375,000 Jews in the district.

It is not the very poorest class alone who are taking advantage of this new migration, but even families of the better class are moving. They can get better quarters for their money in Brownsville. Besides, they are within easy reach of the stores, the markets, and the factories of the greater city, where thousands of them now find employment. These considerations have precipitated the exodus, which was inevitable sooner or later. Bidding defiance to their rapacious landlords, the multitudes are moving in such numbers across the new bridge, that the owners of the moving "vans" have become nearly as exorbitant in their demands as the landlords themselves. So many families have emigrated to the nearby "Land of Promise," that the houses fore many years have passed, Brownsville, in all likelihood, will have become the greatest Hebrew community in the world. Brownsville has become synonymous with opportunity for the poor but thrifty and energetic Hebrew, ever watchful and alert to better his condition. Not long ago, this outlying district of Brooklyn was but a desolate, scarcely more than a waste spot; it now the vacant lots are being rapidly built upon, and buildings are going up with unprecedented rapidity. Nor is it a "mushroom city," in any sense, for the structures are well-built and substantial. Block after block swarms with men, women and children, and prosperity seems to be emerging from sterility. A few months ago, this land could have been bought very cheap, but now, even speculators and investors, who

Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, D.D.

Text—Acts 27:36, "Then they were all of good cheer."

HAVE you ever followed the sea? In these days of multiplied facilities for ocean travel, when mammoth liners, equipped like floating palaces, carry tens and hundreds of thousands of passengers to and fro across the seas, with a sense of security added to the maximum of comfort, we little think of the discomforts attendant upon the ocean voyages of half a century ago. But though the conditions of sea travel have so vastly improved in recent years, that a journey across the Atlantic or up the Mediterranean is no longer an undertaking to be dreaded, there are still many traditions of the sea which time has not materially changed. If you have traveled much upon the ocean, you must know that there are superstitious sailors who dislike to carry ministers, or, as they call them "sky-pilots," in their ships. Ever since the recreant Jonah was the cause of a Mediterranean cyclone, because he would persist in going to Tarshish, when God told him to go to Nineveh, there have been sailors who believe the presence of a minister upon their ship, means head-winds and storms and disasters and misfortunes. This prejudice against carrying a minister, like the prejudice against carrying a corpse, or the starting of a voyage on a Friday, has been gradually getting less and less, as sailors have become better educated. Only a few months ago, a great liner set out from our shores for the Holy Land, carrying among her passengers several hundred ministers of the Gospel. But in olden times, the sailors would look with very distrustful eyes upon any man in clerical garb who might cross their gang-plank. The mutterings in the fore-castle were loud and deep, if two or more missionaries happened to be enrolled at the same time on the ship's passenger list.

Missionaries Aboard

Rev. Dr. James McGregor Alexander, the honored missionary of India, told me that when he and his wife, and five other missionaries, in 1865, set sail for India, the sailors were in almost open mutiny at the idea of carrying such a dangerous cargo of human freight. But when they arrived in Calcutta, after a long four months' voyage of unprecedented clear weather, those sailors were so surprised, that instead of considering their ministerial passengers "Jonahs," they looked upon them as "fair-weather" angels. So completely had their opinion changed, that they told their captain, who knew of their former foreboding, that they wished the missionaries were going back with them on their return voyage.

Superstition, however, is not easily eradicated. This prejudice against ministerial passengers has survived for centuries. Yet in the scene of my text, we have an instance of its being overcome. Here is Paul, a landsman, a prisoner, and a missionary, so winning the confidence of the crew, that they heed his warnings and follow his suggestions. It was, too, in a crisis when nautical skill was needed that they listened to him. There was a storm raging of unusual violence. The dreaded hurricane they called Euroclydon, was lashing the Mediterranean into fury; there was darkness, even at mid-day; all reckoning lost, all hope given up. Then the two hundred and seventy-five persons on board turned to this little Jewish missionary for guidance and encouragement. They had begun the voyage against his advice; they might be prejudiced against him as a preacher and a prisoner, but they listened to him when he addressed them, bidding them be of good cheer. "And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all; and when he had broken it, he began to eat. Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat."

Faith Contagious

Why were the crew and the passengers of this Alexandrian corn-ship happy of heart? First, because faith always begets faith, and confidence confidence, and good cheer good cheer. The belief which Paul felt that "there should be no loss of any man's life, but of the ship," was, by his personal example, instilled into the hearts and minds of those by whom he was surrounded. We know that cowardice is infectious. We know that when a ship is sinking at sea, there is liable to be such a rush for the boats that a panic may ensue. Then the captain, knowing well that only by order and equanimity is there hope for the safety of any, will draw his pistol, and, with determined mien, declare that he will shoot the first man who disobeys orders in forcing his way into the life-boats. We know that when a regiment is resisting the charge of an enemy, the colonel will take his position in the rear of the line, and shoot down any cowardly soldier who would turn and flee. If one soldier were allowed to run to the rear, the whole regiment, like a herd of terror-stricken cattle, might be stampeded with fear. If cowardice be infectious, why may not hope also be infectious? Why is not the calm mien of a Paul able to steady the nerves and make hopeful the hearts of those who before had no hope of being saved from a watery grave?

Courage in Death

In the storms and trials of life, how often have courage and fortitude been inspired by the example of some man strong in faith and undaunted in his confidence in God. Men will believe in Christ's power to save, when they see a man, whose reliance on him keeps them calm in the presence of death. When Hugh Latimer, the dying martyr, turned to the trembling Ridley, who was being tied to the stake at the same time that he was being tied, and said, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out." At once, Nicholas Ridley became a man. His nerves ceased their quivering and he was able to die as a Christian hero. When the frightened patriot, Hérault de Séchelles, ascended the scaffold, over which hung the glittering guillotine, and saw the surging French mob below him, he was as pale as death. His knees trembled and his teeth chattered. But when he turned and looked at the intrepid Danton by his side, who scornfully said to the executioner, "Man, wait a moment! Let the people have a good look and see how a brave man can die," Hérault de Séchelles, became as brave as Danton was brave. "I well remember myself," wrote an old soldier, "as a frightened boy trembling in the ranks at Gettysburg. With fear I saw the Confederate troops being massed for Pickett's famous charge. All that I could do was to restrain myself from dropping my gun and running to the rear. But suddenly every cowardly feeling in my heart was stilled, when I heard a great shout and saw the most magnificent man I ever looked at calmly riding down the lines. Calmly and clearly he spoke as he said: 'Steady men, steady! We must hold these lines. Steady, steady!' When I saw Winfield S. Hancock thus ride along, utterly oblivious to all personal danger, my heart became that of a hero. I became like unto him, who at that moment was my great exemplar."

Yes, yes. We all know what the power of a personal example means in life. We know that when men are brave about us, they make us brave. We know that when men are true, they make us true. We know that when men are noble examples of Christian faith, they inspire us with like Christian faith. So, when Paul, amid the shriekings, and groanings, and heavings, and bombardments of the Mediterranean whirlwind, calmly and deliberately stepped forth, and said: "Men, I exhort you to be of good cheer, for there shall be no loss of any man's life, but of the ship," then the sailors and passengers stopped, and said to themselves: "Why, that is strange talk. We cannot understand it, but Paul must have had a supernatural vision, or else he could not have spoken thus. You speak so positively, O, Preacher, that we believe you. What a God yours must be to inspire such confidence! Would that we had your faith and your religion." Men and women of the Christian life, are your actions and words living witnesses of your faith in the saving grace of Jesus Christ?

A Neglected Warning

Why are the crew and the passengers of this Alexandrian corn-ship happy of heart? Because Paul kept holding up before them the mistakes of their past life, in order that they might the more easily be led to follow in his way. Paul was not a mere taunter, a sneerer, a ridiculer, a tantalizer. He was not one of those mean, contemptible fellows who always stand around when anything goes wrong, and say: "I told you so." He was not one of those miserable comforters of Job, who are about as healing to the bleeding heart as a poultice of cayenne pepper or stinging nettles would be to a mangled arm caught in a press. But Paul was like a good physician who comes to an overworked man and says: "My friend, I told you if you did not hold up, you would have a nervous breakdown. Now this breakdown has come. Therefore I want you now to trust me, and do what I tell you to do, and then we will make you well." Paul, in the same gentle way as the good physician, stands before those helpless voyagers, and says: "Friends, I told you not to loose from Crete. I told you that if we tried to make Rome during this winter equinoctial, you would regret it. But now that this harm has come to you, I want you to obey my commands, and I promise, by the God whom I represent, that there shall be no loss of any man's life, but of the ship."

It is a contemptible characteristic to tell a man his faults and keep telling them, merely to glory in his misery, even as a fiendish cat might tease and tantalize a little mouse and yet not kill it. It is a contemptible thing for a man to come around when your little child lies cold in death and say: "Well, So and So, I am sorry your baby is dead, but I knew she would die." I knew it when you called in Doctor Bigdow as your physician. He always kills more patients than he ever cures. I told you so. I told you so. If you had only followed my advice, your baby would be alive to-day. Can he bring the child back to life again? It is a mean, contemptible act in a man to come to you, after a financial disaster, and say: "Well, Jones, you were caught were you? Just as I expected. Aha! you would not take my advice," when, in fact, the man never gave you any advice, or offered any sensible plan by which you could get out of your threatened danger. But, though it is a mean and a contemptible act to ridicule the misfortunes of others for the joy you have in seeing other people suffer, it is justifiable to plead with them to accept your advice in their trouble, by reminding them that your former advice would have saved them from getting into the trouble.

Dangerous Iconoclasm

In order to erect a mansion, it is often necessary to tear down and clear away the walls of an old family homestead. But no man has a right to tear down or destroy anything, unless he can erect a better in its place. The most mischievous of all social reformers is the destructive iconoclast, who has nothing to offer in the place of the institutions he would tear down. We know our social system is imperfect, but we would not have it mended by an anarchist, who, like the leaders of the French Revolution of 1793, would commence demolishing the good and the evil together. It is easy enough to be a censorious critic. It is not so easy to matter to furnish a better for that which you deride. I remember, many years ago, as an imaginative boy, read that strange, weird, horrible story, called "Caesar's Column." In fascination I followed its author step by step, as he deftly tore the beautiful patterns of modern society into shreds. In horror I read on, as he denounced the social status, not as the generation of Noah was destroyed by this old earth as a waterlogged craft, shipping tidal wave after tidal wave, but as a huge column of piled-up corpses. But as the years have passed by, and boyish imagination has given place to sober thought, the flames and the smoke arising from the funeral pyre of Caesar's Column, embellished with dead bodies, have grown less and less. The great airships, which circled about in the heavens as great flocks of destroying birds, have collapsed. Why? Because we see as a man that though Ignatius Donnelly might advocate the destruction of society by finding fault with it yet with his brain, he could not construct for us a better Utopia. Like Paul, never ridicule a man, never probe for his faults, unless at the same time you can show him how to correct those faults. Never refer to a man's malady or deformity, unless you can tell him of a doctor who can apply a remedy for it.

Why were the crew and the passengers of the Alexandrian corn-ship of good cheer? Because Paul was a man of Christian common sense, as well as of supernatural visions. He knew that the only religion that could really help a man must be a religion that could help him in the present life, as well as fit him for a life beyond the grave. It was not only the promise of safety in the future, that he gave those people, but the sound common-sense counsel of preparation, by keeping up their strength for insuring that safety.

Wise Preparation

"What are you driving at, anyway?" says some one. "Is Paul a mere hygienic lecturer?" He is more than that; but he does not think it beneath his dignity, after seeing the vision of God, to tell the crew and the passengers of the Alexandrian corn-ship to look after their physical necessities. He does not think it irreligious to gather the men and the women of the doomed ship together, and say, "Men, you are going to be saved; but God will never do his part, unless we are ready to do ours. Now, to-morrow we are going to all get safely to land; but there is to be a big drain upon our physical resources. Some of us are now completely fagged out. We have not had a good meal for nearly two weeks. Let the cooks go and prepare the most nourishing din-

THE DOMESTIC SCIENCE CLASS

A Miniature Township FOR CANADIAN BOYS

The Story of a Unique Experiment in Toronto

THE MANUAL TRAINING DEPARTMENT

On April, 1896, the Broadview Boys' Institute of Toronto, an institution unique in Canada because of the many-sidedness of the work it undertakes, was organized under the name of No. 11, Toronto Company of the Boys' Brigade, in connection with Broadview Avenue Congregational Church. It was planned on "self-help and mutual-help" lines, and with a view to the development of the better sides of boy-nature, mental, physical, social, and spiritual. It was designed as an attractive auxiliary to the home, school, church, and business.

Its organizer is a man with a wide knowledge of boys, and much experience in work for their development and improvement. Seventeen boys, formed, at its inception, the modest nucleus of the organization. It flourished and grew, and in a short time it was found advisable to sever its connection with the Toronto Battalion of the Boys' Brigade, and to organize a separate battalion, the Broadview Battalion of Toronto. In the new organization, many new lines of work not previously attempted, were undertaken. The military idea was, as far as possible, eliminated, but a simple form of drill was retained as a means of discipline, and training in alertness and obedience.

Soon, the first accommodations in the basement of Broadview Avenue Congregational Church, were found to be entirely inadequate to the growing needs of the institution, and Superintendent C. Atkinson began negotiations which resulted in the purchase, under mortgage, in March, 1901, at the cost of $20,000, of five and one-quarter acres of land, upon which are a large house and a stable, now used as club-house and gymnasium. A complete reorganization now took place, and the Broadview Boys' Institute was incorporated, with Mr. C. Atkinson as superintendent and financial secretary. Its total membership during the current year is as follows: Boys, seventeen years and under, 551; old boys, over seventeen years of age, 97; total, 648.

In ratio with the numerical advancement of the Institute, has been the extension of its sphere of usefulness and influence. It aims at the development of the boy, to better fit him for the conflict he must face when in manhood, to make him a better qualified workman, a more faithful citizen, a stronger and a nobler man.

Twenty-three classes are conducted by a staff of over forty competent teachers all of whom, together with the superintendent and his assistants, give their services gratuitously. Of greatest importance among these are the agricultural classes, manual training, technical printing, domestic science, basketry, clay-modeling, wood-carving, free-hand drawing, designing and lettering, music, Bible study, and gymnasium classes. A Literary Society, a Curio Club, a Savings Bank, an Employment Bureau, a reading room, and an annual camp outing of from ten to fourteen days duration, are among the features of the work which tend to attract the boy, whatever may be the natural bent of his mind. Such leading men as Prof. Clark, Prof. Goldwin Smith, Premier Ross of the Ontario Legislature, Hon. Richard Harcourt, and many others, have highly commended the practical educational value of the work. A good majority of the boys belong to the artisan or laboring classes. The Institute aims to make of these as thorough and as competent workmen as possible.

Broadview "Miniature Township" is an acre in extent. The sixty-six "farms" which comprise the township are not very large; nevertheless, that acre produces a great variety of vegetables and flowers of a quality better than many an experienced market-gardener could grow. Each plot represents a township lot. A "Reeve" and five town councilors are elected annually. Nominations are first in order, with speeches from the nominees and nominators. Then begins an active, and to the farmers, an exciting political campaign, each candidate having his staff of canvassers and organizers. Immediately after the result of the election (which is by ballot), is made known, the successful candidates are properly installed in office, and commence their duty of governing the township. Regular council-meetings are held, at which all business connected with the township is transacted. Offenders against the laws of the township are regularly tried and penalties imposed, unless the offence is of too serious a nature for their consideration, in which event the case is referred to a higher authority. Lectures are delivered to the young farmers by eminent agriculturists. So important is this work considered, that it has been officially recognized by the Ontario government.

Since the Institute work began, a remarkable change has been observed in the neighborhood. The police aver that the Institute has transformed the whole section.

Broadview Institute is not a charity, but a benevolence. Every member pays a nominal fee, necessarily an exceedingly modest one, in view of the fact that the work is carried on among, and for the benefit of those in the humbler walks of life. It is really a self-help institution, raising what funds it can by its own efforts, yet depending to a great extent upon the generosity of the public for its maintenance. With the aid it needs, and which the character of work accomplished surely merits, Broadview would be enabled to extend its practical operations and its beneficent influence.

as they can. Then let us by turns gather in the cabins, old and young alike, and eat a good, hearty repast. We need faith for the soul. We also need meat for the body." Some people think the most dramatic episode of Paul's life was when he stood upon Mars' Hill and argued with the Greek philosophers; others, when he paid for his life before Agrippa. I think the most impressively dramatic incident was when he was standing upon the rocking, heaving deck of a vessel whose hull was gradually filling with water, and telling the passengers and the crew to eat and look after their families, as God would surely save them on the morrow. My brother, when you do God's work, do not think it beneath your spiritual dignity to obey God's physical laws. Paul praying, a mighty example for us to look after the spiritual bodies; Paul eating food, a mighty example for us to care for our physical bodies.

Why were the crew and passengers of the Alexandrian corn-ship of good cheer? Paul had not deceived them as to the manner of their coming rescue. I had bluntly and yet clearly told them what would happen, and, as events were turning out just as he had described, they were not in the least astonished when the ship came within sight of land and they knew that the vessel was doomed. Though the vessel might be lost, they felt that their own lives were to be saved.

I believe that in urging men to come to Christ, we make a mistake when we do not frankly state the hardships and difficulties of the Christian life. There are, as every experienced Christian knows, sacrifices that must be made, privations that must be endured, struggles that must be fought. It is better that we acknowledge the fact, as Christ did, when men came to him, offering themselves as his disciples. If we fail to tell them that they must expect trial and perhaps adversity in following Christ, they will consider that they have been deceived, and will be disappointed and discouraged when they encounter trouble. As Paul told these men that they would have to battle with the waves, and be in danger of death on that rocky coast before they reached safety, so we should tell men that the way to heavenly joys is often hard and toilsome. Paul demanded of those passengers and sailors of the Alexandrian corn-ship the same sacrifices for their physical salvation, which Hernando Cortes demanded of his followers for the conquest of Mexico. During one of his marches, the Spanish soldiers became disaffected. Cortes assembled his men in line. "Men, some of you are grumbling," he said substantially. "Some of you want to know what rewards I have to offer you at this time. This is my answer"—Then, drawing a line upon the ground with the edge of his sword, he pointed with his steel towards the great East, and said: "On that side of this line are ease and comfort, home and friends, and a life of ease in fair Spain." Then, pointing to the great West, he said: "Yonder are sickness and privation and hunger and cold and death. But yonder is the beautiful capital of the Montezumas. Which shall be yours? Choose ye this day as ye will. Choose ye as brave Castilians."

Christ to-day, like Paul, like Hernando Cortes, promises his followers not peace, but struggle and privation; not ease and comfort, but storm and suffering and trials and misery. But in the end, like Paul, Christ assures you of salvation. Ay, more than Paul offered to the shipwrecked sailors and passengers of the Alexandrian corn-ship, Christ offers to you spiritual redemption for time and for eternity. Men and women, are you ready to face suffering and sacrifice in the name of Jesus Christ? Are you willing to believe him and

But why should not the passengers and crew of the Alexandrian corn-ship be of good cheer? Did not the prophetic words of Paul literally come true? When the mighty ship struck the beach, what happened? Paul turned to the brawny-armed men about him and said, "Leap into the surf and swim for your lives." And these stout-limbed men flung themselves into the seething waters and swam on until at last their feet touched the shore and they made ready to rescue their struggling friends. Some of the women being in all probability strapped to spars, were lifted by the heaving billows and swept upon the rocks, where they were rescued. Some of the men may have come ashore clinging to boards and broken gunwales. At times it seemed as though they must be washed off, but somehow, they are at last landed. So in the end of time and in the beginning of eternity, all Christians shall be safely brought to the heavenly shores, through stress and storm and peril, it may be—but still safe. Yes, we will be there. We shall all be there. Courage, Christian brother. Fear not the perils of the passage. "Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof," the promise of Christ, like the words of Paul, shall come gloriously true.

Slacken no sail, brother, at inlet or island,
Straight by the compass steer, straight for the highland

Fear not the darkness, dread not the night,
God's word is thy compass, Christ is thy light.

Crowd all thy canvass on, out through the foam,
It soon will be morning, and heaven be thy home.

Crowding the Magic City

SCENES AT THE OPENING OF THE EXHIBITION

It was a moment full of dramatic interest for the waiting throng at St. Louis, when, on April 30, at one o'clock, P.M., President Roosevelt pressed the telegraph key in Washington, which opened the Louisiana Purchase Exposition at St. Louis to the world. Announcement of the formal opening was made amid the cheers of the greatest throng that was ever gathered in St. Louis. The day was clear and beautiful, for which the people of the city were grateful, as lowering skies would not have been in keeping with the joyousness of this occasion, which so much effort had been put forth to make one of beauty and grandeur, unequalled by anything of a similar nature in the past record of Expositions.

The official hour for the opening exercises was nine o'clock, A.M., at which time all the officers and managers were to meet in the Administration Building, and by this time immense throngs of visitors were swarming the grounds. To these thousands were added many more who had been arriving by train, during the day and night before. Forming into line, all the officers and directors of the Exposition marched to the Plaza of St. Louis, in the centre of the grounds, where the exercises took place. They were escorted by a detachment of the Jefferson Guards, who will do police duty within the Fair grounds. Following them came the Philippine Scouts' Band; then came the Scouts themselves, a fine body of men, marching in perfect form. Behind them marched Sousa's Band, then members of the National Commission, and, lastly, the Board of Lady Managers.

A long line of representatives of foreign Governments, poured into the Plaza from another avenue. The foreigners made a brilliant display of gold lace, and were prodigal of color, forming a glittering contrast to the formal dress, the silk hats, and black coats of the officials and dignitaries of the Exposition.

The vast throng was silenced by the call to order, as President D. R. Francis requested the audience to rise, while the Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, invoked the Divine blessing. Dr. Gunsaulus concluded with the Lord's Prayer, in which all joined.

President Francis, as the Chief Executive of the Exposition, then delivered his address. He said, in part: "This universal Exposition was conceived in a sense of obligation on the part of the people, of the Louisiana Purchase, to give expression to their gratitude for the innumerable blessings that have flowed from a century of membership in the American Union; to manifest their appreciation of the manifold benefits of living in a land whose climate, and soil, and resources are unsurpassed, and of having their lots cast in an age when liberty and enlightenment are established on foundations broad and deep, and are the heritage of all who worthily strive. To rise to the full measure of such a sentiment required an undertaking of comprehensive proportions, and the participation of all races, and of every clime.

"Six years have passed since the conception began delivered the key of the Exposition to President Francis, who, in turn, transferred the Exposition buildings to Frederic J. V. Skiff, the Director of Exhibitions, thus showing that the buildings were now ready for the real work of the Fair, under the care of Mr. Skiff's department.

Then the grand "Hymn of the West" was impressively sung by a choir. The words of this hymn were written by Edmund Clarence Stedman, the music being composed by John Knowles Paine. Hon. Rolla Well, the Mayor of the city, extended to the visitors a cordial welcome. He was followed by other prominent men, who spoke on various topics in connection with the main interests, and the widespread influence of the Exposition.

Secretary Taft was the last speaker. As the applause died away, President Francis said: "I shall now, by touching a key, connecting with the White House in Washington, inform the President of the United States that this hour and the minute have arrived for turning on the power of the Universal Exposition of 1904." As he pressed the key, the following message was sent:

"President D. R. Francis presents his compliments to the President of the United States, and begs to say that the Management of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition awaits the pleasure of President Roosevelt, who is to transmit the electrical energy to unfurl the flags and start the machinery of the great Exposition."

Raising his hands, and spreading wide his arms, President Francis cried in a most impressive and commanding voice:

"Open ye gates! Spring wide the portals! Enter in ye sons of men, and behold the achievements of your race! Learn the lesson here taught, and gather from it inspiration for still greater achievements."

As the cheers subsided, President Francis exclaimed dramatically: "The Exposition is open!"

The cheering stopped immediately as an official on the platform raised his hand. Then followed a moment of intense stillness, during which from a telegraph key upon the platform there flashed a signal to the White House at Washington. The response was almost instantaneous, and the listeners, spellbound with intentness, heard the first sounds of the whirr of wheels in the Palace of Machinery. The enthusiasm was boundless. The multitude broke into still louder cheers, as the congregated bands burst forth in the music of "The Star Spangled Banner." Simultaneously, flags were unfurled from countless points, along the line of State buildings and National palaces, at the "Pike." There was the sound of many rushing to assume form. The magnitude of the enterprise was never lost sight of by its promoters, but its mammoth proportions, constantly increasing as they developed, never for a moment shook the confidence, weakened the energies, or diverted from their well defined purpose those who have been intrusted with the responsibility and the work. To-day you see the consummation of their efforts."

aters from the fountains in the Cascade, and the lagoon received the tumbling mass with a glittering, amny welcome.

The United States Government Building is the only one on the grounds which is complete in the arrangements of its exhibits, excepting that of Japan. Many of the booths even are not completed in the other buildings, while the floors are piled with exhibits in unopened boxes and packages. In a short time all the exhibits will be in place and the buildings fully completed.

In the opening exercises, President Francis used a gavel which possesses a historic significance. It was made of wood carved from an ancient oak tree that for more than a hundred years towered on the summit of Art Hill. This tree was a landmark for the aborigines, and sheltered many of their graves, which were unearthed to make room for the crowning feature of the Exposition. An American eagle in silver, with outspread wings, embellished the gavel. A map of the two hemispheres encircles the head, while inlaid in the handle are the shield of the United States and the fleur-de-lis of France, representing the parties to the Louisiana Purchase. The tip of the handle is finished with an acorn from the ancient oak tree. Thousands of visitors wandered up and down the "Pike" after the ceremonies were over, and viewed its most striking features. Here were representatives of the United States cavalry, the Boers, and Asiatic peoples of many nations. A sixty-five foot Chinese dragon propelled by Celestials, was in close rivalry with "Borax Bill" and his twenty-one mule team. Here were Geisha girls from Japan, in jinrikishas; Irish girls in hunting cars, and American Indians in all their fantastic array. The "Ship of the Desert," with its patient, ungainly ways, side by side with the stubborn little donkey; a menagerie of wild animals, and various other interesting and curious features, make the "Pike" a most unique thoroughfare, which will be fully as attractive as any "Midway" of former exhibitions, and much more instructive. Far from being a procession of freaks, the exhibits make a dignified panorama of customs and peoples of various parts of the world. It has been said with truth that the anthropological student can learn more from it in an hour than he could gather from books in a year. More than 250,000 people visited the Exposition on the opening day, and there beheld, what Secretary Taft—who represented President Roosevelt at the opening exercises—called in his speech "the great milestone in the united progress of the world." He said "This is a union of nations in a progress toward higher material and spiritual existence. It is the measuring rod of that for which myriads of brains and myriads of hands have been striving—an increase in the control,

This great "Ivory City" has been erected with the aid of 100,000 men, and at an expenditure of $50,000,000. So many and varied are the interesting features of the Exposition, that it would be next to impossible to select and describe any one of them as being the best and most beautiful. There are ten great ivory-white palaces, arranged in fan-shape, as to location. Festival Hall stands on a hill overlooking the Cascade Gardens, where are enormous waterfalls—the largest ever constructed—over which 90,000 gallons of water per minute pour down in torrents. At night this wonderful water scene is illuminated by electricity. Gondolas traverse the Lagoon, which winds its way through the main grounds. Semicircular in form, the Cascade Gardens slope gradually from Festival Hall to the main level.

On the crown of the crescent-shaped hill surmounted by Festival Hall, is the Colonnade of States. In the Court of Honor, stretching from the main entrance to the Lagoon, are typical sculptures, chief of which is the Louisiana Purchase Monument, one hundred feet in height, the shaft is seventeen feet in diameter, and mounted by a statue of Liberty. There are also sculptural groups symbolical of the twelve States and two territories formed from the "Purchase."

The Japanese exhibit, with the exception of that of the United States, is the most complete of any. The arts and crafts of this wonderfully progressive nation, attracted a great deal of attention and favorable comment. The exhibit was arranged with the remarkable skill and attention to detail for which the Japanese are famous.

The most wonderful developments in electricity are shown within the Palace of Electricity, and the beautiful lighting effects of the entire Exposition are such as to appeal to the admiration of a large number of visitors. This building, which is one of the most beautiful in the "Ivory City," covers nine acres of ground.

It seems almost impossible to realize, as one gazes upon this splendid scene, that only two and one-half years ago there was nothing to be seen there but forest and farm. A little river, with unsightly mud banks, wound its way at the foot of the hills that are now crowned with stately palaces. A new channel was made for the river, involving a difficult and expensive bit of engineering. This new course was formed by a heavy wooden enclosure, the top of which, paved with asphalt, now forms the main central avenue on the Exposition grounds. Six hundred and sixty-eight acres of Forest Park of St. Louis were given by the city as the nucleus of the World's Fair grounds. Private tracts of almost equal extent were acquired by lease, so that the total area of the grounds is now more than twelve hundred acres.

The World's Plague of War

IN a recent issue of Le Figaro, a leading Paris journal, there appeared a characteristic interview with Count Tolstoi, in which the aged Russian philosopher gave expression to views and opinions that are of great interest and timeliness. The correspondent writes:

"I raised my eyes and saw fastened to the wall with pins a French map of Korea and Manchuria. I said: 'This conflict is more than the conflict of two nations; it is the struggle of two races. What, according to your view, will be the consequences?'

"'What will that matter,' replied Tolstoi, 'I do not differentiate between races. I am for mankind, first of all, and whatever may happen, what will mankind gain by this war? The sadness of it is that it shows how far man forgets or ignores his duty. More important than his duty to family or to country, is man's duty to his God. But men forget these essential ideas, they no longer read the Gospel—that admirable book. They obstinately insist upon remaining in a state of barbarism. And we see them engaging deliberately in a fearful war without thinking of their first duty, the essential duty of being right-minded and abolishing warfare. . . . I agree that civilization carries with it an active and educational power. But where is this civilization? Why do you wish that I should place it in Europe? Because the Europeans have created artificial needs and employed their genius to satisfy them? Because they have invented the railway, the telegraph, the telephone, and so many other things? All these acquisitions of a pretended civilization seem to me the inventions of barbarism. They serve and flatter that which is lowest in man. I do not see that they confer any moral superiority whatever upon him. I do see, however, that the use he makes of his intelligence is most often in the way of evil, not of good.'

"'It is not by modern inventions that it is necessary to judge the development of the human mind. We wonder at the pyramids, and we ask ourselves: 'For what did they serve?' All these inventions of civilization are our pyramids. I believe that in thousands of years a people will come who, discovering our remains, will say: 'What strange beings were these who imagined that traveling at high speed from one place to another was an essential of life.' They will be right.'

"'Speaking of the Asiatics, he said: 'We know little of the yellow world. My view is that the Chinese, the Hindus are not warlike peoples, but that they despise war and those who wage it. That is already something, a true superiority over us. I understand that they are not given to killing; I learn from the accounts of travelers that they are safe in business; that they respect their word; that they do not lie. There again is something uncommon in Europe. And if they are cruel, are we not, also? Has any one kept count of the atrocities laid at the door of the pretended civilization of the world? Where are the acts, where the results of civilization in Europe? . . . I say to myself, without the least reservation of conscience, that the judgment of the world cannot surpass the judgment of humanity. My conscience tells me that murder, in whatever guise it may be brought about, is execrable, that war is a big, hideous plague, that all which combines to bring it about is to be condemned.

"'There is nothing more frightful. The world has never seen the like of it. In the days of Genghis Khan those who wished to slay were the only slayers; men had the right to remain in their homes, to till their lands, to live in peace and to do good. But the civilized world is to-day more ferocious than Genghis Khan. Men are ordered to kill, whether they wish or not, and if they refuse, they are punished as for a crime. How can one accept such a state of affairs? Why does not conscience revolt against it? Why is there such blindness to this bloody tyranny? What is to be done, what is even to be attempted, I ask you, so long as these things shall endure? How may we hope to ennoble souls while they yielded to such servitude?'

"A little while afterward he concluded: 'Man has always on his lips this fine word liberty. But he does not rear the thing itself, does not establish it, he does not organize it. The whole problem is to suppress violence, to end it, then liberty will arise! Man has risen above torture, above slavery—is this nothing? He loosens his bonds little by little each day. The time will come when he shall be utterly free.'

Russia's Amazons

M^LLE. MARIE SAPERNIKOFF, who recently requested permission from the Russian Minister of War to form a corps of two thousand Amazons to go to the front, at her expense and under her command, has applied for an audience with Czar Nicholas, whom she hopes to win over to her side. In an interview, she said that she saw no reason why women should not go to war, and that the Russian women were fully able physically of standing the rigors of a campaign.

The Bible League

GOOD wishes for its success will come from every section of our land, to the American Bible League, the first Convention of which has just been held in New York. From the report on another page of this journal, it will be seen that the object of the League is to defend the Bible from the destructive criticism which is undermining its influence. No more useful and necessary service could be rendered by any organization. The attack that is being made on the Book, is all the more dangerous because it is the work of men who have been esteemed as its friends, and who occupy positions of great power and influence in our colleges. The defence, therefore, ought to be conducted by men of learning and sound judgment, who are capable of meeting the enemies of the Word on their own ground. As will be seen by the list of speakers at the Convention, such men have been enlisted in the army of defence.

It is worthy of notice that many of the speeches at the Convention showed a spirit of fairness, and a recognition of the value of much of the work done by the critics. Fair criticism, and reverent examination of the Word cannot do harm. The Bible will bear investigation, and when it is done in a reverent spirit it will make the Book all the more intelligible to the student. We want to know all there is to be known about it, and to get its true meaning. It is the work of men who delight to tear the Book to pieces, and to cast doubts on its authenticity and authority, that is mischievous. All critics are not of that kind, and it would be unjust and ungenerous not to discriminate. Nothing is to be gained, and much may be lost, by denouncing the honest, friendly criticism which is sincerely directed to the elucidation of Biblical difficulties. That fact the Bible League evidently realizes, and there is, therefore, all the more hope that its work will be effective.

The World's Hope

WHEN will this sinful and blindly perverse old world be lifted above its faults and its follies and become enlightened? When will it be redeemed, in the fullest sense—experiencing a transformation which will make all men brothers, and will purify society, both high and low, as a whirlwind clears the loose dry stubble off the field? To look abroad at the condition of affairs on the globe to-day, and to view its sanguinary wars and its great armies and navies marshaled for the slaughter of men; its intricate forms of government, supported at such vast expense, yet contributing almost nothing to the happiness or progress of the race; its endless tomes of statutes that oppress more than they protect; and, above all, its contending creeds, that antagonize far more than they reconcile—these and countless other considerations are sufficient to depress the thoughtful mind. It would almost seem, at times, that man has lost all his ideals; that his faith in himself, in the destiny of the race and even in God, have been forsaken or forgotten, in the widespread spiritual degeneracy that now seems to prevail.

Prominent writers and thinkers have called attention to the fact that ours is an age of mediocrity, unmarked by the presence of any great poet, statesman, painter, novelist, or preacher—"a time," as one writer has said, "of general unsettlement, both of beliefs and institutions." If they had been wholly candid, these lamenting critics might have gone farther in their analysis. Fallen away from God, the world is stricken through with sin and, as in the days that preceded the French Revolution, its multitudes are drifting dangerously near to the rocks of infidelity. Some of the churches have bartered away their spirituality, and have now comparatively little power and influence with the masses. The "righteousness that exalteth a nation" is scarcely to be found. Society, high and low, is permeated with gross selfishness, and the hunger for wealth, power and pleasure, combined with a disregard of the humanities, is daily becoming more pronounced. Opulent indulgence is to many the highest good. God is mocked, and this beautiful world in which He placed man with a mission to gardenize and develop it, and to live in peace and brotherly love, is little better than a stamping-ground for the worst passions. Such is the sinister side of the picture, and it is not a pleasant one.

Happily, however, there is a brighter aspect and one that gives the Christian believer ground for hope in behalf of his fellow-man. There is in the hearts of all thoughtful men and women a deep longing for a better state of things. This can only come from one source: it must be, as a distinguished divine has expressed it, "One of those great movements which in literature is called a renaissance, and in religion a revival." We believe and contend that the present conditions afford the grandest opportunity for service that the followers of Jesus have known, in this age at least. The time has come to impress upon the world more powerfully and convincingly than ever before, the priceless value of Christianity as an alleviator of humanity's burdens and a remedy for the existing evils. Jesus taught a Gospel that is equally applicable to the highest problems of government, and the humblest question that affects the lot of the day laborer—a Gospel that carries the solution for every difficulty that can arise in human experience, yet so clear that even the simple can understand it.

The time is ripe for the followers of Christ to "take courage and go forward," in the name of their Captain. In the church, in evangelistic work, in the home, in business, and everywhere, let them redouble their energies, and by their teaching and example, proclaim to men the inestimable value of the Christian faith, as the one thing the waiting world needs. Let our churches exert themselves, and let the thousands of Christian organizations, setting aside all lines of division, unite for the arousing of popular interest and for the awakening of the consciences of men and women. That Divine blessing will attend such efforts is assured. And as it is always the darkest hour before the dawn, so let us hope and labor and pray that present conditions may be followed quickly by a season in which God will manifest his power in the quickening of souls, and that great multitudes may be won from sin to righteousness.

The Pleasures of Travel

WITH the greatest ease to herself and the utmost speed, a home-staying person may to-day fly across the continent. Limited trains are furnished with every imaginable convenience and luxury. The dining car of a Pullman coach spreads for the hungry passenger a table not inferior to that ordinarily provided in the finest hotels; and for her who can sleep away from her own bed, a couch is made ready by the assiduous porter, on which she may have happy dreams.

Nothing is more entertaining to a stay-at-home who has ventured to take wing, than to rush past towns and villages with lightning speed, to glide over bridges and trestles, and to catch glimpses of the unfamiliar landscape, of mountain, river and lake, as the train flashes by. One passes through a belt of snow-covered country, though the calendar reminds that spring has arrived. An hour later and the sun shines, the ice and snow have disappeared, and one goes with celerity into a fairyland of summer warmth.

The traveler who, missing a connection, must spend part of a night at an inn, and then be aroused at two o'clock in the morning, receives a novel impression of the busy time the night is for hundreds of her fellow-beings. She steps through corridors, velvet-carpeted and soft, and the elevator takes her down to an office where many people are astir. The hotel omnibus meets the morning train at three o'clock, and carries her to board it for her further journey. At the station, people are coming and going, as if it were broad day.

Thousands of the men who serve us—policemen, milkmen, bakers, night-watchmen, engineers, porters, conductors and others, to say nothing of the vast army of men who are editors, reporters, type-setters and others, work by night. The market-men are up before dawn, that they may be ready for the toil of their busy day.

Life is not easy for many of us. But we who may early retire, and, as the children say, turn our heads on the pillow, with a "Good-night, sleep tight, wake bright at morning light," have the advantage over those who must turn the crank of the needed labor-machine in the hours between midnight and dawn.

To go on the road with the minimum of hand luggage is the wisest course. The experienced traveler discriminates between the must-haves and the may-haves, and carries little weight. An extra rug of some thickness, or a warm golf-cape or shawl, should, at every season, be included in the portable luggage of the woman who travels. She will be almost sure to regret the omission, if she forgets this caution.

Among the Workers

—A READER in Seim, S. D., writes Rev. Mr. Chapin Freeport, Kan.: "We are still one hundred miles from church I do wish we could have church here and Sunday School."

—F. J. BIRD, manager of the Banner Mission, Philadelphia, has opened a reading-room, and provided a variety of Jewish literature for Hebrew inquirers. A regular service for Jews is held every Sunday at 3 P.M.

—ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY new members were accepted into full membership in the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, on a recent Sunday, making 1,642 new members taken in during the last six years. Rev. S. E. Young is pastor.

Does This Appeal to You?

FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND men and boys hailing from every State and section of the Union, indeed, from every part of the habitable globe who for the time being have made shipwreck of life enter the doors of the Bowery Mission every year. Many of them are clothed and fed by us, and every one is helped and encouraged.

Tens of thousands have been rescued from ruin, and restored to sobriety and usefulness. Many of these were sent back to their families at our expense. There is no land in the wide world that does not contain some, who, through the beneficent influence of this great work, have been reclaimed from utter despair, and perhaps a drunkard's grave.

The work is going on gloriously, but is in need of financial assistance, and in its behalf I appeal to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and if they respond as God shall lay it upon their hearts, I shall indeed feel grateful and happy, and to the blessing which attends every gift offered in His Name, I will humbly add my own heartfelt thanks.

Remember, that during the past winter 71,000 homeless men and boys received a hot breakfast, given between 1 and 3 A.M., to break the monotony of the nightly tramp of those hungry, friendless and helpless men, many of them the sons of parents who are wondering what has become of the happy-hearted, bright-eyed young man who but a few years ago, full of hope, with elastic step, left the home of his childhood, in the hope of achieving fame and fortune.

Help as your heart moves you, and do it to-day. Every contribution will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Thibet Still Closed

GENERAL satisfaction, both in this country and in Great Britain, has been expressed at the report that the British Government will withdraw its expedition to Thibet. The attitude that land in refusing permission for foreigners to enter it, is deplorable. The rulers are wilfully depriving their people of the advantages of civilization, but when it was discovered that they would resist by force any attempt to open communications, and that only by a slaughter of great numbers of Thibetans could such an attempt succeed, it was a relief to learn that no further efforts were to be made. Enough was learned by the expedition to convince the world that Thibet is governed by an oppressive despotism, and that fearful cruelties are practised on the people, but there is no justification for forcing upon the country a civilization which it is clearly opposed. The expedition had undergone severe hardships in traveling over the mountains; it had been compelled, in defending itself, to inflict a hideous slaughter, and the results, if it should persevere, would not compensate for the heavy cost. There is reason to believe, so, that King Edward's effort to reach an amicable adjustment of pending questions with other Powers may have been the cause of the proposed withdrawal of the expedition. It has succeeded in allaying the animosity between England and France, and it is rumored that he has approached Russia with a similar object. The attack on Thibet could not be other than offensive to Russia, and it may be that the king found that it would embarrass him in his endeavor to reach a friendly understanding with that Power. In any case, whatever the reasons may have been, the news of the withdrawal of the expedition is contemplated with welcome to all who love peace and hate war.

The fruit of righteousness is own in peace for them that seek peace (James 3: 18).

40,000,000 Payment

By the transfer of forty million dollars from the United States to the Panama Canal Companies, the purchase of the property has been completed, and the companies have given an order to their agents to turn over the control of the zone on the Isthmus, and the works and machinery to the agents of our Government. It was not necessary to transport this huge sum to France. By an arrangement with Morgan & Co., who acted as disbursing agents for the United States, a Treasury warrant was accepted as payment, and so a financial disturbance which the bankers on both sides apprehended, was avoided. The French law courts had already decided what organizations and in what proportions the payment should be made, as a new Panama Company had succeeded the original one, which had not disposed of its rights. Morgan & Co., will make the payments in accordance with this decision, and it is understood that it will be done gradually, as the money is required. The route and all the property upon it has now passed into the possession of our Government. It is stated that some time must elapse, before actual digging will begin, as new plans and surveys must be made and extensive preliminary operations will be necessary to improve the sanitary conditions of the isthmus. The Canal Commissioners are now about to make a tour of inspection, with experts, who will report on all the questions involved. Now that the purchase has been completed, no time will be lost in executing the project which for so long a time has been awaiting consummation. A way for the vessels of all nations will be made through the isthmus which has hitherto barred their course and compelled so long a detour around the Cape.

Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones (Isa. 62: 10).

In the Prison He Built

In reporting the result of a recent trial, the New York Herald calls attention to a remarkable coincidence. A man was being tried in the Court of General Sessions, of New York, for forgery, and the jury brought in a verdict of guilty in the second degree. A juror's indiscretion, however, in inadvertently taking from the table to the jury room, some papers which the judge had ruled out of the case, subsequently brought the verdict into question. It is probable that the fact of the jury having had under consideration those papers, which were not intended to be used, may be made a ground for granting a new trial. In the meantime, until the legal argument can be heard, the convicted man has been sent to the Tombs to await the decision. The Herald says that he is one of the men who helped in building the prison in the neck was severed. He had heard the story of the mysterious disappearance of the ring from its owner's table, and he therefore took it to her, and she identified it with a great deal of pleasure at recovering it. The rat must have been a little creature when it ran its head into the ring, and it must have suffered torture afterwards. Who can tell how many people there are who prize such ornaments, and endanger their very souls in their efforts to obtain them, who may yet find that their spiritual life has been deformed and depleted by their success!

Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of wearing of gold, . . . but let it be the hidden man of the heart, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price (1. Peter 3: 3, 4).

Heroes of the Mine

A brave deed was done by three men at Scranton, Pa., on April 26. About noon fire broke out in the great breaker of the Scranton Coal Company, which is known as the Pine Brook breaker, which is one of the largest and most modern structures in the coal-fields.

It is estimated to have been worth $150,000. It stood over the mouth of the mine, in the dark chambers of which over six hundred men and boys were at work. Their position was most perilous, and they were ignorant of their danger. The news quickly spread through the city, and soon there were hundreds of women and children around the blazing pile, all concerned about the lives of their husbands, fathers, sons and brothers in the subterranean regions below. Screams and the sounds of sobbing and eager inquiries were heard on all sides. Presently, three men—Morris, Murray and Foley—were seen to enter the cage and signal to the engineer to lower them. His place was by no means enviable, but though the smoke and the intense heat from the blazing timbers almost overpowered him, he bravely held his post and lowered the three men to the bottom of the shaft. Each man took a direction of his own, and soon every one in each section had received warning. There are three entrances to the mine and by them all escaped. The meetings of the men with their wives and children were most pathetic. All must have been deeply grateful to the three men who, at the risk of their lives, went down into the mine, to give warning. How happy a thing it would be if, when sinners are warned of their danger, and are told of One who laid down his life to save them, they would avail themselves, as these miners did, of the way of escape!

Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus (Col. 1: 28).

BRIEF NOTES

In the Bombay Mohammedan Mission News, a list is given of ten Mohammedan converts, baptized within the last eighteen months.

An attempt is being made to unite the denominations of Baptists and Free Baptists, in the Maritime Provinces of Canada. A joint committee is organized to discuss the terms.

The original name of Port Arthur was Lou-Chun-Kao. It was so far back as 1885 that the change was made, when for the first time an English ship-of-war cast anchor in the bay, the name of the commander being Arthur, the port was named for him.

The Revival meetings conducted by Dr. Chapman, in Chicago, have been very largely attended. Dr. M'Affee of the Presbyterian Church, reports that he has not witnessed so deep and widespread an influence since the time of Mr. Moody. More than two thousand persons have made profession of conversion.

DRAGGING ARMY STORES UP THE MOUNTAINS OF THIBET

which he is now confined. That is one of the strangest examples of the irony of life. It is similar to the historical incident of the man who invented the guillotine in France being executed by that instrument. One would have supposed that a man who had helped to erect a prison would have been careful not to do anything for which he could be made an inmate of it. Yet human nature is slow to learn the lessons that seem most obvious, and as there is reason to fear, there may be some who have labored to save men from perdition, who will themselves be lost. The Apostle clearly intimates such a possibility.

Lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway (1. Cor. 9: 27).

A Bejeweled Rat

A lady residing at Mount Holly, N. J., recovered in an extraordinary manner, a few days ago, a diamond ring, which has been lost for several weeks. A farmer's son living in the neighborhood undertook to clear his father's barn of the rats which infested it. Among the rodents dragged out and killed was one that struck him as being singularly malformed. Examining it closely, he found that it had a lady's ring around its neck, which seemed to have almost choked it. The flesh had grown upon both sides, so that it could not be drawn off until

Spreading the Light in Dark Colombia

FLOWER-GARDEN IN THE HOME AT BUCARAMANGA

A STREET IN BUCARAMANGA

WAR, with its train of attendant evils, has left many parts of the little South American republic of Colombia in a sorry plight. According to a recent letter, received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Mrs. A. P. Norwood, wife of the American missionary at Bucaramanga, food of all kinds is still nearly at famine prices. She writes:

Food has come down some. Corn is now $2 per pound, Irish potatoes $3.50 per pound, salt $6 per pound, rice $8 per pound, and American lard $25 per pound; unbleached muslin, domestic good quality, $10 per yard; ordinary prints $8 per yard. These prices, of course, she explains, are in Colombian paper currency, one dollar of which is worth about one cent in American gold. Hence, one dollar in American money goes a long ways here.

Readers of this journal are already somewhat familiar with the missionary work of Rev. Joseph Norwood and his devoted wife, at Bucaramanga, where, in addition to spiritual duties extending over a wide area, they some time ago founded an orphanage for the helpless children of the Colombian city. Concerning the progress of this work, Mr. Norwood writes:

The work of the Christian Home for Helpless Children, in Bucaramanga, is moving on nicely, and the Lord, through the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other friends, has provided the means necessary for the current expenses of the thirty-six children who are now in the Home. There has been a great deal of sickness in Bucaramanga during the last few months, and many deaths in the other orphan asylums; also great mortality in the public hospital, but we have been spared from the sorrow of burying any of our little ones up to the present time.

The government, both national and departmental, is in such a state of bankruptcy that it cannot possibly pay the meagre salaries of its employees, and consequently helps the benevolent institutions principally with promises. So great is the poverty and suffering, that the local charities are entirely inadequate to meet the now daily increasing calls for help. Even in the public hospital many are dying for want of suitable food and medicines, as I have been informed by a prominent merchant who issues tickets for admission into the hospital. The applications for admission into our Home are at the present time very far beyond our ability to accept.

is now facing a crisis in her work. The land occupied by missionaries is to be sold, and the missionaries will be dispossessed, unless they can be assisted in securing the necessary for the purchase of the mission building. Mrs. Stombaugh will answer any inquiries.

Six children have been added to our number since our last report. Mrs. Norwood gives her entire time to the work without compensation, and our entire income, including my salary as Agent of the American Bible Society, is put into the work. The spiritual branch of the work is moving on beyond our fondest hopes. We have kept up not only the Home for Helpless Children, but also the Sunday School, and public evangelistic services every Lord's day. In my absence, Mrs. Norwood has had the assistance of two of the most highly educated men in the country—men of very high social standing—one an able lawyer and the other a prominent coffee-planter. The prospects are growing brighter for the establishment of a missionary movement through the Departments of Santander and Boyacá, which will be almost self-sustaining from the beginning, if we can get the necessary buildings and means to place it on its feet in a respectable way. We have already secured property in Bucaramanga well adapted to the work, worth more than $10,000, which has a mortgage on it of $2,500, and are offering for a low price, a country seat only a short distance from Bucaramanga, and in one of the most healthful spots on the Continent. With these two pieces of property cleared of debt, and with the help that is now coming in, we would be well equipped for a glorious work. The American Bible Society is using every effort to place the printed Word in the hands of the people, and is laying the foundation for the solid superstructure.

Any reader who may wish to aid this promising work, can communicate with Edward P. Tenney, Treas., Roselle, N. J.

The Dauphin Island Mission

Mrs. O. E. Stombaugh, for the last years a devoted and successful mission worker on Dauphin Island, Ala., where many of the rude settlers (oystermen and fishermen) have been won to Christ through her efforts, is now facing a crisis in her work. The land occupied by missionaries is to be sold, and the missionaries will be dispossessed, unless they can be assisted in securing the necessary for the purchase of the mission building. Mrs. Stombaugh will answer any inquiries.

The Rough Riders of the Czar

WHAT the "Rough Riders" are to the American army the Cossack is to Russia, but in a much larger degree. The personal escort of the Czar is supplied from a Cossack regiment. The world has never yet seen a finer body of light cavalry, and the Russian military authorities have allowed the hardy horsemen of the Steppes to retain something of their own method of warfare, and to grant them a set of regulations distinct from those of the rest of the army. The services the Cossacks have done to the Russian Empire are historic. It was they who conquered Siberia under the leadership of the valiant Yermak. It was they who defied the Turk, and, without artillery, captured the fortress of Asov. To them is entrusted the most difficult of all tasks, that of guarding the ever-growing frontiers against resentful neighbors. Recent travelers have described the Cossack outposts on the borders of Manchuria perched in almost inaccessible wilds, showing that the old duty has been assigned to this race of frontiersmen.

At the age of three the Cossack learns to sit astride a horse in the courtyard of his father's house. Two years later he shows himself on horseback in the village street, and exercises with his young comrades. No wonder that at the age of twenty he seems almost to be one flesh with the sturdy beast that carries him.

The Cossacks are said by some authorities to have originated from emigrants who could not stand the slavery of the Russian system, and preferred so far back as the tenth century to lead a nomadic robber life in the Steppes of the Tartars. These nomadic hordes grew in power and number till they became a formidable force, and as the Cossacks, or "free men," were more friendly to their Russian kinsfolk than to the Tartars, they gradually formed as a convenient buffer State. They elected their own atamans (hetmans) or chiefs till the beginning of the present century; they owned large herds of cattle, and many of them attained considerable wealth.

Under the present regime, there are no less than fifty-one regiments of Cossacks, under eleven main tribal divisions. Chief of these are the Cossacks of the Don, who give name to a province of a million and a half inhabitants. The following are the names of the eleven main divisions:

Cossacks of the Don, Cossacks of the Kouban, Cossacks of Terek, Cossacks of Astrakhan, Cossacks of the Oural, Cossacks of Orenburg, Cossacks of Siberia, Cossacks of Semiritchie, Cossacks of the Transbaikai, Cossacks of the Amur, Cossacks of the Ussuri.

At Russian military reviews the Cossack always plays a notable part. Every member of the squadron is a rider, who could put the cleverest circus acrobat to shame; and the firing exercises introduce features which only clever riders with clever animals could perform. On the first day of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, a Cossack regiment covered seventy miles in twenty-four hours to secure an important bridge. The latest reports from Korea show that Cossack scouts have made daring dashes to the south, in spite of the immense superiority of the Japanese forces in the triangle of Seoul, Pyeng-Yang and Wensan.

A remarkable feature of the Russian and Cossack soldier is his insensibility to pain. In the Balkan struggle men suffering from incredible wounds used to march stolidly to the ambulance, so that soldiers left in the fighting line should not have to be detached to carry them away. A good story, though not strictly Cossack, is told of the soldiers in a redoubt at Sebastopol, who were about to partake of the usual soup from the usual pail. A shell fell in their midst, but a cool-headed Russian ran, and dropping it into the pail, cried, "Welcome, Maria Ivanovna; taste our soup."

besides being a notable fighting man. He won his spurs in the conquest of Bokhara, saw opened the gates of half-legendary Samarkand, and traveled and studied a great deal, says a writer in The King. Then he was Skobelev's Chief of the Staff in Turkestan, rode over 2,000 miles on horseback with wounded arm, and was the great general's right hand at Plevna. In that sanguinary time he fought heroically, and came back with a splendid reputation for courage and the best soldierly qualities.

He has since been Governor of Transcaucasia, and has occupied many other important positions. When the late Minister of War left his office, Kuropatkin was the only possible successor, and the Russian army made vast strides under his hand. Fire, energy and sagacity are all in the general, who is Russia's most trusted soldier. Of course he is not a young man, and has not seen fighting for years, but he is in full vigor. He takes out with him the men he knows and has confidence in. Whatever is to be done Kuropatkin will do, if to do it is possible, and the Russians will not lose heart while their general directs their soldiers. Besides being a bold fighter, Kuropatkin has the reputation of being a practical student of military history and a great strategist.

A BEAUTY TALK

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WE need not wonder that women care a great deal about beauty. It is every woman's right to possess a harmonious, strong, and beautiful body, a fit home for a beautiful soul. As a rule, little children born into happy homes, and well nourished, are attractive and pleasing, and possess a satin skin, bright eyes, and lovely curves. Alas, they soon grow out of this exquisite condition, into something not quite so fine.

Up to the age of twenty-three or four girls who have outgrown the angularities of the early teens, are also beautiful. A woman's hour of fullest beauty is reached about the age of thirty, when she is at the meridian of her charms. This is the prime of life, but until she is fifty, no woman who has health and a passably easy life, not crushed under hard work, should so much as begin to fade.

The outer elements of beauty are a clear complexion, bright eyes, good teeth, a carriage, well kept hands and feet, and abundant hair. Yet, after all, as the body is only the vase which forms a transparency for the soul, these charms are of little worth, unless a fine mind and a gentle heart are behind them. Up to extreme old age, some women retain beauty. No one can look, for instance, at the venerable face of Julia Ward Howe, without seeing that she represents a type of rare comeliness, a type not obscured by the burden of her years. The late Elizabeth Cady Stanton, to her latest days, was a woman of dignified presence, attractive personality, and great physical beauty. The beauty of age and the beauty of youth are, of course, of a different order. The latter may be enhanced by dress; the former, to a certain extent, is independent of dress and does not need external things to add to its fascination and perfection. When the rose-bud melts into the rose, the superlative of loveliness is attained.

One of the first necessities, if a woman would be beautiful, is to know how to breathe; yet this is one of the most neglected of all daily duties. We breathe improperly. Our lungs are not filled with vital air.

A strong, normal, rhythmic respiration, should be about four heart-beats during inspiration, and held for the space of two; then exhaled during four, making ten heart-beats for one complete respiration. Breathe through the nostrils, of course, and mentally count four pulsations of the heart. Count two beats also, while you hold the lungs empty." This advice is quoted from a medical authority.

There are hundreds of people who never practice deep breathing. There are hundreds or thousands more who never know the delight of taking a real walk outdoors on a fine day, inhaling and exhaling the pure air, and getting the fine exercise which means not only health but beauty. To walk with a dawdling, dragging gait, with head poked forward like a turtle from its shell, with bending shoulders and languid steps is, in no sense, a proper walk.

To walk gracefully is to walk well and, other things being equal, to be able to walk a great distance without exhaustion. He, as usual in the construction of man, grace and real beauty go hand in hand. Utility and beauty are often opposed to each other in the world of things, particularly in the world of man-made things; but in all that appertains to the physiological machinery of the body the greatest beauty is the greatest utility. Any act of work, to be well done and with comparatively little fatigue, must employ a harmonious working together of all the organs. The movements of work so done will be graceful.

"From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man."

When we rise to walk the whole body should be thrown into a state of gentle tension, putting every muscle which harmonious movement employs into vigorous, responsive action, and so perfectly balanced that every part does its work without perceptible strain. The abdominal muscles should hold that obtrusive part in comely restraint—quite possible even with the portly—if they will but make the effort. The shoulder, hip and ankle joints should be on a line; the chest held high and head erect, but not tipped back. The correct position of the head may be tested by holding a book on the crown. In this position the body acquires its greatest ease, and every muscle performs a maximum of labor with a minimum of waste and expenditure of force. Another essential of beauty is the daily bath. No woman can be beautiful who does not, every day of her life, bathe from head to foot. The best time for the bath is in the morning when one rises, or else at night before retiring. As to the sort of bath to be taken no one can dictate. There are some persons to whom a cold plunge in the morning is an essential of life, joy and health. There are others who find that they do not react from this, who are cold and blue after it, and to whom it is far from invigorating. They should avoid the cold bath. Take the sort of bath that is best for you. It need not be a bath in a tub. A sponge bath in a basin of water, with a rough towel and thorough for the rest of the body is a deformity. The wearing of tight shoes or of shoes too short for the feet, has cramped and ruined innumerable feet, and been the prolific source of a great deal of suffering, in corns, bunions and ingrowing nails. No woman will be beautiful who is habitually fretful, depressed or selfish. The beauty of the soul insensibly moulds the features, and a happy disposition is as great a beautifier as sunshine and outdoor air. I shall have more to say about this another time. It is a subject too large for one week.

Restful Homes

The prevalence of cluttering objects of ornament, and the great variety of cups, vases, curios, pictures and other articles which some housekeepers allow to encumber their parlors, all tend to destroy restfulness in the home. A restful atmosphere is found in simplicity. When one enters a home plainly but comfortably furnished, with solid chairs and tables, with couches broad and springy, above all with plenty of books and papers, the first feeling is one of entire repose. This is emphasized by the untired look, the sweet tranquility of the hostess, who has not to spend her strength and waste her nerve-tissue in endless dusting, polishing and guarding fragile treasures which have cost much money, and must, therefore, be zealously watched. Some of us would be the gainers if we should put under lock and key, a large part of the beautiful and precious things in our homes.

Photographs of Women

In these days of multiplied illustration, every week sees the face of some matron or maiden, who, in former days, would not have been known beyond her own circle, published and sent to the farthest corners of the land. Women are engaged in clubs, in philanthropy, and in business and professional careers, and it is right that their pictures should be printed, as well as sketches of their lives and work given to a public that at present clamors for personal details.

I have a word, however, to say as to the style of photograph that a woman gives to a magazine or newspaper. Such a picture should be severely plain as to dress; a rigorous simplicity should characterize it indeed. The low neck and bare arms which belong to an evening dress, have no excuse to be exploited in a periodical that goes into thousands of strange homes. Nor is an enormous picture hat, with great brim and nodding plumes, appropriate for this particular use. Lavish display of jewelry is absurdly out of place in the published photograph. The woman who patronizes a splendid charity, or presides at a club, or carries on an orphanage, or makes a new discovery in science, if she permits the wide world to look at her in the pages of a magazine, should be dressed for that occasion in a tailor-made costume, with simple hat, or in a high-necked, long sleeved home-gown.

When one thinks of it, the fitness of things is the foundation on which most of our conduct of life is built. A glance at the portrait galleries of our periodicals will convince women, that, except when toilettes are reproduced for some design of fashion or historical accuracy, they should furnish only very plainly-dressed pictures to the outside world.

SPRING-TIME AT THE FARM

The lilacs bloom beside the door,
The vines are all in flower,
The oroles are here once more,
'Tis May's enchanting hour.
Oh, far away the battles rage,
But peace unfolds her charm,
Here dwell in gladness loving hearts;
'Tis spring-time at the farm.

Though hard may be the daily task
Of those who till the earth,
No odds of any one they ask,
Although of royal birth.
An Eden light is o'er the fields,
No spoiler works them harm,
When manly strength and woman's wit
Meet, spring-time, at the farm.

rubbing will prove quite as useful as a bath taken in a tub with many gallons of water. This thorough purification has a great deal to do with beauty.

Next, No girl need hope to have a good complexion and bright eyes if she eats too many sweets or lives on fried food, hot biscuits and strong coffee. Coffee and tea are the natural foes of the bright complexion of youth, and though older people may require stimulation, children and growing girls should do without them in the interest of good looks.

Nice hands and feet have a good deal to do with making a woman attractive. It has been well said that a well dressed woman pays special attention to her gloves and her boots. A woman whose hands and feet are graceful and well cared for, will always present the appearance of a lady, even though she may do a great deal of work with her hands indoors, as in housework, or out of doors, as in gardening and rowing. It is within any one's power to protect her hands by the use of rubber gloves or a mop, so that they do not become needlessly roughened and reddened.

The prevalent idea that a small foot is a great beauty should by this time have passed away. A foot too small

A New Bonnet

It is doubtful whether any man can understand the pleasure of a woman in a new bonnet. For one thing, it is the coronation of her toilette. The prettiest costume may be utterly ruined by an unsuitable piece of head-gear, and a girl who looks bewitching in a hat that suits her, may be almost plain in one that looks as if it were meant for her maiden aunt or her mother. Women are unwise to allow milliners to load their hats with cherries or grapes, since fruit is manifestly unfit to be worn on one's head, as though one were Pharaoh's chief butler or baker with goods to be shown to the monarch. Birds and bird's wings are too suggestive of cruelty and of the spoiling of the nest and the murder of sweet warblers, to be tolerated by a woman of gentle nature. With lace, ribbon, beads, and dainty weaves of straw, the hats and bonnets of the hour are very graceful. While John stalks down the street with a comfortable straw hat, let him not complain if Mary buys for herself something that is more ornamental, as she belongs to the sex whose province it is to combine decoration with utility.

THE PASSOVER

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

LET Peter tell the story of the last Passover and the first Lord's Supper: "We have been several days with our Master in Bethany, going over to Jerusalem with him on Sunday, on Monday and on Tuesday, returning to Bethany each night. Sunday he had made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, where people laid their garments in the way, and waved palm branches, crying, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' On Monday he cleansed the Temple of the dishonest money-changers and traders. On Tuesday he uttered his last public teachings in the Temple, more abundant than on any other day. Even we who had been constantly with him were amazed at his many profound utterances. On Wednesday he abode quietly in Bethany. It was his last day for teaching us, his apostles. "When Thursday dawned we went to him, and asked, 'Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover?' And he appointed John, together with myself to go over to Jerusalem and secure a place. He did not tell us to ask for the chief or upper chamber on the roof, but for the katalyma, a sort of hall opening from the court, in which shoes, dusty garments and the like were laid aside upon entering a house. He told us distinctly how we should find such a place. As we were entering the city, we should see a man bearing a pitcher of water, and should follow him until he should reach his home, and then we should tell him that our Master has asked a place of him where he might eat the Passover with his disciples. The man bearing the pitcher was none other than our friend Mark, my own son in the faith. We went with him to his father's home and requested that our Master might have the use of the katalyma for "A great and terrible surprise awaited us. It came when he declared that one of our number should betray him! 'Is it I, Lord?' we said one by one. Even Judas, who intended to do it, asked the question. Jesus made a spoon of the paper-like bread, and dipped it in the soup, and passed it to the mouth of Judas—a token of love even for his betrayer—which, to some of us, was the sign that it was he! Immediately he left the table and went out. We knew afterwards that he proceeded at once to see the Scribes and Pharisees, and arranged for a slave's price to betray the Master.

"After Judas had gone, and the pascal supper was ended, a new 'Lord's Supper' was begun. As he gave the bread to us, he said: 'Take, eat, this is my body.' And as he gave us the fruit of the vine, he said: 'Drink ye all of it, for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins.' And after this, we sang the usual psalm together: 'The Lord is my strength and song.' And then we went out upon the Mount of Olives to Gethsemane, where Jesus agonized in prayer, and where, later, Judas betrayed him with a kiss. Apparently he had thought he should get his money, and Jesus would get no harm because of his miraculous power, for when he saw the fruit of his covetousness would be the Cross, he gave back the money to Christ's enemies and went and hanged himself. The money, being the price of blood, was used to buy the potter's field."

This "Memorial Sunday" is a fitting time to recall how the nation of Israel was divinely saved through blood at the command, "Confess Me before men," shows that we are still required to "show our colors." The cowardly and obedient are self-condemned. Year after year, the Passover lamb was eaten in every Jewish home with loins girt and in hand, to recall that the first Passover was so eaten in race of slaves about to leave Egypt for a new land of dom. They were escaping not only death but slavery; their children's children would understand how, through death for them and the life in them of the Lamb of souls are saved from both the slavery and death of sin. These meanings and more were to pass over into the Lord's Supper.

One of you shall betray me . . . Lord, is it I? is a possibility that even communicants may fall into deadly, which made that Lord's Supper so solemn a scene of searching, is one thing that makes the communion so so to thoughtful people still. There we think not alone of possible, but of sins past, in which we have betrayed our Lord, often through the very covetousness that made Jesus of Judas, that it were "better he had never been born," at does not sound like universal restoration. It gives a glimpse of what the "spiritual death" is, from which Christ, our Passover, saves those who hide behind the blood of Calvary.

An apt illustration of the Passover, in that aspect suggested by the loins girt as for a journey, signifying: That this world is not our rest, but that we are journeying to a home land is the story of the Rothschild mansion in London, where his pascal supper. Mary, the mother of Mark, who was a chief woman among the Christians in Jerusalem, quickly responded, 'Not that, but he shall have the aliyah, our best upper room, which is large, furnished, and ready.' By this we understood that the room had already been prepared for a pascal supper—the table in place, the couches in order around the table.

"All that was left for John and myself to secure was the lamb. We were at the Temple with our lamb at the hour of the evening sacrifice, usually 2.30 P.M.; but an hour earlier at Passover time. In every direction people were seen bringing their lambs to the Temple. We were among the first to slay our lamb, and to have the fat upon the inward offered upon the altar as a sacrifice. We then bore away what remained upon our shoulders, in company with hundreds of others doing the same thing, and went to the home of Mary. Then we made haste to roast the lamb, that we might be ready for our Master and our ten comrades, all shortly expected from Bethany. Just as the sun was going down, we saw them coming over Olivet.

"In every home there was a pascal supper that night, and the sign for the beginning was the appearance of the three first stars. Between the sunset and the gleaming of the stars, there was opportunity for the washing of feet and hands in preparation for the feast, and for determining the arrangement of places at the table. There was an unseemly contention about who should have the most honorable places. And what a lesson the Master taught us then, and in what a strange manner. He girded himself with a towel, and took a basin and a ewer filled with water, and proceeded to wash our feet, as a servant would have done. He came to me first, as my place was at the end of the table, just opposite John, who had been given the place at the right side of the Master, with Judas on his left. I remonstrated against the Master performing such a service for me, but when he said I could have no part with him unless I submitted, I wanted him to wash not only my feet, but my hands and my head. And so he passed around, washing the feet of us all, teaching us a lesson of humility and the dignity of service. Then he took his place at the table.

Passover, and how our individual souls come to spiritual life through the atoning death of Christ. When the "struggle for life" in the field of politics and business is revealing unusual tragedies of selfishness, it is a good time to point to the "nobler struggle for the life of others," in which Christ, the manliest character that ever walked the earth, has shown us the glory and beauty of self-sacrifice.

The Passover passing over into the Lord's Supper, is but one of the many examples of how "the New Testament is enfolded in the Old, and the Old Testament is unfolded in the New." He who exalts the New Testament while belittling the Old, only proves that he knows little of either, for they are as essential to each other as the picture gallery and its explanatory catalogue. In order to understand the Lord's Supper, we must first understand the Passover in which it originated.

Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover? Jesus was no narrow Jew, but a world man, and he was no formalist, but a man of the Spirit; yet he observed and valued religious ceremonies as needed helps to faith. If he had not felt the need of them for himself, as he manifestly did, he would have observed them for the sake of others, who did need them more, and who would be influenced by his example. This should be borne in mind by those persons who care little for religious forms. As to the Lord's Supper, three monosyllables in the command of Christ, as to its continuance "till he come," give conclusive answer to those who say we no longer need to observe it.

Let us recall the Passover (Exodus 12). God appointed it to be the beginning of a new life, a new year, a new era, significant of the new birth to which we come through what the Passover signifies. Egypt, having disobeyed God's command to let his people go, was under sentence of death. The first-born in each house, was to die as its representative. The Israelites were given a simple "plan of salvation," with which every one could comply, if he would. The first-born of whatever race would die, respectively, in every home that did not obey. A lamb was to be slain, and its blood sprinkled on the outside of the door, where the destroying angel might see it, as a signal to pass over that house. This clearly signifies that faith in the blood should be outwardly confessed. It would not do to sprinkle the side of the door, or say prayers in secret, as if religion was a hidden shame. The passers-by have often noticed that one of the cornices is finished. The explanation is that Lord Rothschild, the one of the richest men in the world, has not forgotten tradition that every orthodox Jew should leave some part of his house unfinished, as a testimony to all who see it, that he regards himself, like Abraham, as only a pilgrim and stranger on the earth, journeying to a better country, where his home is a house not made with hands, complete and eternal.

As this Sunday is a military anniversary, three Lord's Supper illustrations from great soldiers will be especially timely. During the war of the Revolution, Washington, once encamped with his army near a small village, where stood a Presbyterian church. Washington heard that Lord's Supper had been announced for the following Sunday, and so called on the preacher, and said: "Doctor, I have you are to have holy communion next Sunday. I belong to another denomination—can I partake?" "Most certainly," said the preacher, "for it is not the Presbyterian table, the Lord's table." "I'm glad of that," said Washington. "That is as it ought to be." And the next Sunday he knelt with the humble villagers at the brotherly table of the common Lord. A more familiar story of Wellington, relates that when he was kneeling at communion, an ill shepherd came and knelt beside him. When the latter said it was Wellington, he rose in shame to go, but Wellington said: "Stay, for in the sight of God, I am only a wretched sinner like thyself."

When Admiral Dewey came home from his victory at Manila, New York City gave him a large and beautiful "loving cup" of choicest gold, decorated with forty stars for the sisterhood of States. The three handles were three dolphins in green gold, and on the front was a portrait of the Admiral surrounded by an oak wreath, resting on an eagle. It is said to be the most elaborate loving cup ever made in the United States. But this cup is well-nigh forgotten, while the simple "loving cup" that Christ gave to his lowly disciples nineteen centuries ago is used by thousands all over the world every week to recall his love stronger than death, and to point us forward to the promised cup from which we are to drink at his table in heaven, where no anxious misgivings about betrayal will mar the eucharistic gladness of perfect fellowship.

Strawberry Short Cake

The Advance Guard of Delicious Summer Foods

Don't buy it at the restaurant nor of the baker. With Royal Baking Powder the Strawberry Short Cake may be made at home easily, perfectly. Use either of the following receipts. The confection will turn out beautiful, appetizing, wholesome. Use Royal Baking Powder. Do not use so-called "prepared" or "self-raising flour."

PLAIN SHORT CAKE

INGREDIENTS—1 quart flour, 1 teaspoon salt, 2 heaping teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, 2 tablespoons butter, 1 cup milk.

SWEET SHORT CAKE

INGREDIENTS—1 quart flour, ½ cup butter, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 tablespoon sugar, 2 heaping teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, milk to make soft dough.

METHOD—Sift the flour, salt and baking powder together, rub in the butter cold; add the milk (or milk and sugar), and mix into a smooth dough, just soft enough to handle; divide in half, and roll out to the size of breakfast plates; lay on a greased baking-tin, and bake in hot oven ten minutes; separate the cakes without cutting, as cutting makes them heavy.

Roll, hull, wash and drain, ripe, large, honey-sweetened, spread between layers of short cake. Garnish top layer with whole berries, dust with sugar, and serve with cream or custard.

The War in the Far East

DETAILS of the battle of May 1, on the Yalu, show that it resulted more disastrously to the Russians than first reports indicated. On the Russian side, under General Sassulitch, were some 18,000 troops, including several regiments of Siberian sharpshooters, a cavalry brigade, the whole of the Third Division of infantry, two regiments of the Sixth Division, about forty quick-firing guns, eight machine-guns, and some light mountain-guns. General Kuroki, the Japanese commander, according to the dispatches, had an immensely superior force, both in troops and artillery. Including the Imperial Guard, it is estimated that the Japanese strength at the assault at Kuliengcheng, was not less than 30,000, while at least 100 guns of heavier calibre than those of the Russian artillery, supported every movement of the infantry by a terrific fire, doing great execution among the Russians, who had no weapons of equal range to the sixteen siege-guns, which General Kuroki had placed in position to command every movement of the enemy. The crisis of the battle was a great infantry charge by the Japanese, covering a front of four miles, and culminating in a sweeping victory, which drove the Russians from the heights overlooking the right bank of the Iho or Aida River, and out of their successive lines of trenches, with heavy loss.
Although the Czar's troops made a most determined stand, they were outflanked, surrounded on three sides, and compelled to retreat before superior numbers.

It was during the retreat across the hill-roads near Hamatan, where the fighting was sharp and at short range, that the Russian guns were captured by the Japanese. Twenty-eight quick-firers fell into the hands of the enemy, with a large number of prisoners.

There were some remarkable instances of bravery on both sides. At one time, when the fight was hottest at Kuliengcheng, a battalion of the Eleventh Infantry Regiment, already decimated in the terrific struggle, was seen to be advancing. Preceded by buglers, sounding their instruments to clear a passage, and with a line almost as firm and straight as though on parade, the Russian column swept forward with fixed bayonets. Its regimental chaplain was in front of the first line bearing aloft the cross. As the men moved forward at the double, the amazed Japanese, apparently declining a hand-to-hand conflict, gave way a moment.
Then the deadly fusillade began anew; but the plucky regiment forced its way through the enemy's line, though at the sacrifice of its brave chaplain and scores of soldiers.

Not until the next day, when the retreating Russians were on the road to Fengwang-cheng, and the Japanese were searching the widely extended field of Sunday's struggle, did the actual losses become apparent.
General Sassulitch, in his report of the battle, says the Japanese repeatedly attacked his troops with the bayonet. Japanese bodies lay in heaps at the fords. At Kuliengcheng, the Russian trenches were exposed to an enfilading fire, and had to be abandoned. At Chin-Gow, the Russian left flank was turned, after a heavy artillery attack by the Japanese.
All the regiments suffered heavily, in both officers and men. Japanese sharpshooters made targets of the brilliant uniforms of the Russian officers, and picked them off in great numbers. Russian estimates now place the total losses in killed and wounded at between 3,000 and 4,000, leaving the impression that the Japanese suffered at least as heavily as their opponents. On the other hand, General Kuroki's report, places the Japanese casualties at 798 in killed and wounded, and estimates the enemy's losses at 2,000. Thirty Russian officers were captured and about 500 other prisoners.

On May 3, the retreating Russians had reached Feng-wang-cheng, where it was believed the next fight would occur. After a two days' rest, the Japanese took up the march to Feng-wang-cheng, to the relief of which Gen. Kouropatkin is said to have started from Liao Yang with 20,000 Russians.

St. Petersburg dispatches criticize Gen.
Sassulitch for his failure to withdraw his troops in time, when the presence of a vastly superior force made his position untenable.
He may be tried by court-martial for disobedience. On the heels of the Yalu fight came the news that Admiral Togo had again sunk a number of merchant hulks at Port Arthur, and that he now believed he had blocked the channel completely. This result seems to have been waited for at Tokio, for large fleets of Japanese troopships and cruisers shortly thereafter appeared at several points on the Liou-Tong peninsula. It is said that a force of 63,000 men under Gen. Oku was landed at Pitsevo, about eighty miles northeast of Port Arthur, on Corea Bay, and that another force was landed at Port Adams, at the head of Society Bay, or at Kinchow the port of New-chang, on the Pechili Gulf. Grand Duke
Boris and Viceroy Alexief have left Port Arthur for Harbin. It is believed that a land-and-sea attack on Port Arthur is imminent.

PUZZLE No. VIII.

A UNITED STATES whale-ship stopped for supplies at an island of the Pacific, and the first officer went on shore to trade with the natives. After deceiving him inland until he was out of sight of the vessel, the savages stripped off his clothing, bound him, and led him to the place where their cannibal feasts were held. Here the man was tortured during a whole night. Next morning a missionary, whose home was near by, appeared, and began to plead for the white man's life. He was a native of another island, recently evangelized, and had come to bring the blessings of the Gospel to these cannibals. His most valuable possessions were offered as ransom, and the American was set free. Weak and ill, he was cared for at the missionary's home, and then put on board his ship.

When the President of the United States heard the facts, he sent to this missionary gifts valued at five hundred dollars, and the thanks of the nation. Of the missionary's reply to the President, Mr. Robert L. Stevenson said: "I do not envy the man who can read that letter without emotion."

? When did this incident occur? Name the island, the officer of the whale-ship, and the native missionary ?

A FOOT RACE

Minister vs. Boy

"Facts are facts and stubborn things indeed," says a Michigan clergyman who had a memorable food experience.

"The fact is when a man gets all out of sorts physically because of a derangement of the stomach so that his heart action is bad, is very nervous owing to physical organs impaired, and nothing he can eat of an ordinary kind will properly assimilate, it is time to call a halt. Such was my case two years ago last March, when I commenced using Grape-Nuts according to directions, and have continued their use up to the present time with the result I am in better health physically and mentally than I have been for many years, having passed my 63rd year.

"To demonstrate this fact I proposed a foot-race with my 11-year-old boy, who was very fleet on foot, and he being barefoot, imagined he could outrun his Pa, but I was besting him until a slip of my foot on a muddy place caused me to stumble, and I found myself rolling in the mud in the road. I soon found my footing again undamaged, and had to join in a good, hearty laugh with my wife and daughter.

"Why should I not recommend Grape-Nuts to my friends when the food has done so much for me, for I am confident that had it not been for the help this excellent food supplied, I would to-day have been past recovery. Instead of growing old now, I feel younger than I have for years, with more mental strength as well as physical, and can preach better sermons than ever before." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Grape-Nuts makes far healthier, keener brains. A dull, worn-out brain can be remade on this food. There's a reason.

Settled Out of Court

A WOMAN stood motionless on the pavement close by the great hall of the Law Courts. She wore the shabby black of the needy, her sweet face was lined, her eyes care-haunted, her lips had the patient droop of continual disappointment.

She watched for some one, her gaze never faltered from the continuous crowd streaming from these halls of justice, which the necessities of human wrong have raised, and which are upheld by the conflict of human passions.

At the curb a carriage waited, the eager horse pawing the ground with impatient hoof. The woman pressed her hand to her heart and bent forward to get a better look at a man who crossed the pavement towards the waiting carriage. He was in his prime, he had a keen, serious face, and the prosperous appearance of one who has waged successful war with fate. He gave the word to the coachman, entered the vehicle, and was about to close the door when his eye fell upon the woman's face. Instantly he alighted and motioned her forward. She seemed to come unwillingly, impelled by the command of his eyes.

"Get in, I want to talk to you. I did not see you in court."

"What has happened?" she asked in a dull voice, her eyes only betraying the soul's tumult.

"The case has been settled out of court."

"In your favor, I suppose? Where is Walter?"

"Never mind him. He is a poor creature, not worthy your devotion, hardly your interest."

"I am the best judge of that. He is my husband; I have never forgotten it," she said, with reddening cheek.

"Nor have I. If I had permitted myself to forget it for one instant, then my forbearance must have ended."

"Your forbearance!" she cried shrilly. "But he has suffered so much at your hands."

"Reverse the positions and you will be right. Yes, I have suffered many things at his hands. Listen," he said with a sudden passion. "There were two boys born of one mother, given the same chances, prepared in precisely the same way for the reality of life. One adhered to the rules laid down, and tried to live decently and uprightly, while the other became shiftless, idle, criminal in his disregard of responsibility. And they both loved the same woman."

"He has never cared for anyone but me," she said, and there was a proud, hurt note in her voice.

"Nor have I."

"Oh, John Hardwicke, what are you saying?" she cried, and the dull red broke into flame on her cheek.

"I am speaking the truth. There are times when truth is a luxury, no less than a necessity. My time has come. For twenty years he has been a thorn in my flesh, humiliating and wounding me at every turn. I have forgiven him all for your sake."

"But you married?"

"Yes, and she is dead. To-day I am certainly the loneliest man on the earth. Then he brought this unjust claim on Uncle Henry's money. He had his share; you best know what has been done with it. You shall have the rest, settled absolutely on yourself and your boys."

"You are generous," she murmured. "Unexpectedly so, but why?"

"You will see," he answered. "Here we are."

The carriage was drawn up before one of the tall old houses.

It was Agnes Hardwicke's first introduction to the home of her rich brother-in-law, and though she had often tried to picture it, imagination had been at fault. Quiet tones, subdued lights, an atmosphere of peace and unpretentiousness prevailed. But over all that winter day there seemed to brood a strange stillness.

"Come upstairs," he said, and she followed him up the winding way to the long corridor, where there were many closed doors. He opened one and motioned her in. She drew back with a little quiver of fear, chilled by the drawn blinds, the faint odor of white flowers.

"Oh, what is this?" she asked, trembling.

"Gladys," he answered, dully. "She died yesterday."

She stepped forward and stood a moment by the white bed. She was a beautiful child who lay there, with the halo of her gold hair about her sweet face, her lily hands folded above her quiet breast. And she was the rich man's all.

"Oh, John, forgive us," the woman cried. "We had no thought of this." And there was that in her face she could not put into words.

"It matters nothing now. Go home, and thank God for your children. She sometimes spoke of the cousins she had never seen, I am sorry now they had no chance of meeting. She was very lonely always. Perhaps—so she died."

Agnes Hardwicke covered her face with her hands, and passed weeping through the door.

Endeavorers in Missions*

How Christian Endeavor is Helping the Missionary in His Work

THANKS to the devotion and energy of Dr. Clark, who appears to have made the great apostle of the Gentiles his model, Christian Endeavor is now in active operation in all the greater mission fields. The missionaries have been alert to see the help it is capable of affording them and have availed themselves of it. One conspicuous service it renders, is likely to be of far-reaching value. It is that of developing native effort. An obstacle to the advance of mission work in many lands, notably in Japan, is the tendency to regard Christianity as the foreigners' religion. The patriotic spirit is consequently prejudiced against it. Conservative minds cling to the national faith and do not listen favorably to the American or European missionary's plea for Christianity. It will be different, however, when the native advocates the religion of Christ, and nothing so well fits him for that work as his training in the Christian Endeavor Society. It prepares him, not so much for professional work as a native preacher, as for the duty of going about his daily business in the spirit of Christ, ready to give a reason for the hope that is in him. His friends and fellow-workmen, seeing his life, perceive the beauty and power of his faith and are attracted by it, as they are not by the preaching of men who, as they say, are paid to propagate Christianity.

A remarkable specimen of this native adoption of the Christian Endeavor system, was seen recently in the Christian Endeavor Convention at Ahmednagar. Native Christians went to it from all sections of India, and made an imposing demonstration. The only building in the city capable of accommodating the throngs who attended, was the theatre, and that was packed with 1,800 young people. Scarcely a dozen foreigners were there. The managers, the speakers, and the audience were natives, and the proceedings were conducted in the native language. It has been so in other missionary countries, and the result must inevitably be beneficial.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for May 29, Luke 1: 49-55.

The Lord Sent Prosperity

In your issue of March 9, C. A. T., of Hoxie, Kan., desires to have some one tell him of a "tangible answer to prayer." Five years ago I adopted the plan of giving the Lord one-tenth of my income, and asked him to prosper me, if he approved. I made as much again as in any former year of my life, and did not work or try any harder. I have made as much in the past five years as in twenty years before.

He has answered my prayers in a great many ways, that to me are wonderful, but to one who is sceptical not so tangible. Now I pray only that I may lead souls to Christ.

The Defence of the Bible

FRIENDS of the Bible everywhere will be glad to hear of a movement organized to defend it from the assaults of destructive critics, while professing Christianity, are undermining the authority of the Book.

DR. FRANCIS L. PATTON

The movement has taken the name of the American Bible League, and it has held a convention in the Marble Collegiate Church, New York, at which the objects of the League were explained by many able Biblical scholars. Among them was Dr. Francis L. Patton, President of Princeton Theological Seminary, who said:

We need, and we invite intelligent criticism of the Bible. We can't shut it up in a glass case. We all admit that this controversy may be managed by minute experts of the Bible on each side. We are willing to submit our case to the court, and we expect a verdict. Meanwhile, while these critics, good and bad, fight it out, what are we going to do for the ministers who are going on preaching very little amenities of morality and sociology from their pulpits, their congregations are the same time getting to that state where they think one doctrine or two, more or less, do not matter?

I used to be held that Christianity was a religion of supernatural information with respect to a future life. When that authority is gone from the Church you have got to get a secular backing to uphold your Church. If I believe the Almighty gave us a Word to guide us of the eternal peril, we are idiotic if we neglect that word. Why has exegesis failed by the board? A change has come over the world, and with men it has come to be a question not what the Word has to say, but whether one is bound by it. Thus men have turned to a new philosophy of religion, and are obliged to put a new meaning on the Bible, and stand in a new attitude toward it. There has come a literary criticism of the Bible from the men, and, perforce, they no longer hold their old view of Christianity.

They would say Christianity is a movement, a stage in a great cosmic process, a moment of evolution, with which we have as little to do as with the equinox. To them the scriptures are simply a history of religious experiences.

When there was no primeval innocence, no fall, no redemption, no incarnation. They hold these things not to be doctrines, but only teachings, making up what is really going more than a metaphysical philosophy. What we most need is to get rid of the philosophical and to get back to historic Christianity. It is not a metaphysical or a psychological question as to whether or not Christ rose from the dead. Did he? Is he very good? very God? If not, you have no right to worship him. Nicodemus, who said, "I believe," is worth a whole congregation of apostles.

All comes round to the question of judgment of fact and value. If you can discard the former and retain the latter, what's the good of Christianity? You can then preach just good a sermon from Aesop's fables as from the Holy Scripture.

The interests of morality, home, trade, the Ten Commandments and civic law, we hold our old Christianity as it is traced back, and back to St. Paul and the atoning blood. Or is it to be back to atheism and deism?

David James Burrell, in the course of an eloquent speech, said:

The result of the modern attitude toward the Bible, is nothing short of calamitous to the teachers. I know men who do not believe in the doctrines they preach. The great multitude of the people who sit in the pews, are loyal to the Word of God, and the preachers know it. Why should people come to church to hear a man air his misgivings and doubts? As Goethe said, a man has enough of his own. Men are too busy to-day to go anywhere to hear "ifs" and "perhapses." They want to hear the man who has convictions and who can deliver them without mouthings and numblings.

Dr. Daniel S. Gregory, general secretary of the Bible League and chairman of its educational committee, said that the committee had in mind a threefold campaign:

(1) of education in regard to the contents and uses of the Bible; (2) of literary work to make the position of the League clear; and (3) of organization of forces to defend the Bible against the results of destructive criticism.

"Present ignorance of the Bible," said he, "is a proof of the failure of the old methods of presenting Bible truths. What we want is a constructive system to supplant the destructive and scattering processes of the higher criticism."

Among other speakers were Dr. S. L. Bowman, of Newark, N. J.; Dr. Albert H. Plumb, of Brooklyn; Dr. J. B. Remensnyder, of New York; Prof. G. Frederick Wright, Oberlin Theological Seminary; Prof. Robert D. Wilson, Ph.D., D.D., Princeton Theological Seminary; the Rev. M. G. Kyle, D.D., Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., the well-known Egyptologist; the Rev. Robert Mackenzie, D.D., New York, formerly professor in San Francisco Theological Seminary, and Rev. James A. Worden, of Philadelphia.

Mr. William Phillips Hall, President of the League, who, though a layman, has kept himself thoroughly abreast of the discussion aroused by the Biblical Criticism, in describing the purpose of the League, said:

To most fully realize its object the League proposes to lead Christians to a better and more comprehensive and complete mastery of the Bible itself; especially as found in the English versions, and in carrying out this purpose, to promote everywhere a devout, constructive study of the Bible as a whole, and in its various books and parts, by the common sense and rational, or truly scientific method, and with the aid of all the light that can be thrown upon it from all sources, to meet and counteract the errors now current concerning its truthfulness, integrity and authority as the word of God.

Mr. Hall announced that another convention of the League would be held in New York later in the year at a time not yet fixed. He added that requests had been received from Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and a number of other cities for similar conventions.

Gen. Howard Makes an Appeal

I often hear from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD indirectly, and sometimes directly. At this time I want to make a special appeal for our "Lincoln Memorial University" at Cumberland Gap. It is indeed a group of schools fitting itself into the mountain country and adapted to the wants of the boys and girls of that region. It is, indeed, the highest kind of charity, for it enables these young people to maintain their self-respect and to pay their way in part by scholarships and by work. We have employed this year eleven teachers, and we have kept them upon the promise that they will be promptly paid. Now, to my own disappointment, a few who promised to pay in their subscriptions have not done so, and one of the largest subscribers has been hindered by matters beyond his control from meeting the principal or interest this year, and it is not wise for us to borrow, so that I entreat you to aid me in the raising of $5,000 for running expenses for this noble institution. Please send in the money to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Many of you have followed the work in the mountains, and I want to say that it is not only flourishing but phenomenal. Our industrial department is magnificently successful and will be organized shortly into even better form. Our teachers have gone out into destitute districts, over fifty of them altogether, since the beginning of our schools; for example, one of them this year, a young woman about eighteen years of age, taught a lengthy winter school, having eighty-three pupils, the most of whom were just beginning the race for a practical education.

The battle goes bravely on in the mountains, the feud spirit begins to disappear, and there is less of it than there has been any time before within my recollection. So help us in this emergency, and God will bless you.

In the best of bonds, very sincerely yours,
O. O. HOWARD,
Major-General U. S. Army, retired; President
Board of Directors L. M. U.

Eighteen thousand TONS of "FORCE" eaten during the last twelve months!

I'm afraid to put in cold figures how much wealth I honestly think has been created by the human energy drawn from that vast amount of my sunny food.

Sunny Jim

A food is good for you to the extent of the real nourishment there is in it, less the amount of energy it takes on your part to assimilate it. That sounds very learned, but it simply means that "FORCE" has in it more good and is easier to digest than any other kind of food—and this includes meat as well as "breakfast foods."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

THE CHINESE BOY HERO*

AFTER days of bombardment in the Legation at Peking, there was a call for volunteers to take a message to Tientsin and make known to the gathering armies the situation in Peking. Some messengers had already gone out and had been killed; others had returned, saying they could not get through the lines of the Boxers. A Chinese boy volunteered.

On July 4th, about the time when American boys at home were beginning to fire their earliest crackers, he was led to the top of the city wall. As it had been planned that he should go as a beggar, he had been dressed in rags and tatters, and provided with a large, coarse bowl, such as the native beggars carry.
The precious message, written very small, was wrapped in oil paper, placed in the bottom of the bowl and covered with porridge. Even the most wily Boxer would hardly think to look there, and the boy had felt no concern about it until he had nearly reached the bottom of the wall. Then his bowl struck against some projecting bricks and broke in pieces!

He could not call back to his friends, for fear of rousing some sleeping enemy.
So he carefully fished out the tiny parcel from the porridge, removed the oil paper and, tearing a little piece from his ragged garment, wrapped it, with the tiny note inside, around his finger, as if it were sore. Later he ripped the hem of his garment and slipped the note into it.

Before long the Boxers hailed and searched him, but, finding nothing, they said: "Let the little beggar go."

His progress was slow, but always in the direction of Tientsin. Kind-hearted native women gave him food, and he slept under the stars. All went well until, when about half way on his journey, he stopped at a farm-house to ask for food. Now here dwelt a man whose farm hands had all left him and joined the Boxers; therefore he forced the boy to stay and work for eight days.

By refusing to stay or by running away, the boy feared that he would excite suspicion; but while he was working he was thinking how to escape without appearing too anxious to go.

On the eighth day he would not eat his breakfast, but lay groaning and shamming illness. No doubt the rice smelled very savory to him before night, but he would not eat. Finally the farmer said, "You'll have to clear out of here. I can't afford to have you die on my hands." That man would have been surprised if he could have seen how briskly his invalid walked when some distance from the house.

The boy reached Tientsin to find it a scene of recent battle, with soldiers of the united nationalities standing guard everywhere. He wandered about for two or three days before he could get through the lines. He could not step up to the soldiers and say: "I have a message for your general," for they would not understand his language; but he finally succeeded in getting through, and he delivered the message to the British consul on July 22.

Very soon after a reply was given him, and he started on his return trip. This was the message which he brought on a tiny slip of paper, addressed to Sir Claude MacDonald at the British Legation:

"Your letter July 4th received. There are now 24,000 troops landed and 10,000 here. General Gaselee expected Taku to-morrow. Russian troops at Peitang.
Tientsin City under foreign government.
Boxer power exploded. There are plenty of troops on the way if you can keep in food.
Almost all ladies have left Tientsin."

story of personal experiences of American women and children during the Peking siege. Pp. 411.
Illustrated. Price $1.25, cloth. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York and Chicago, publishers.

Our little hero's return trip was less eventful than the one going down, but he saw Boxers in every village, and on reaching Peking on July 28, having been only six days on the return trip, he found it difficult to get through without attracting attention. However, just before daylight, he managed to crawl through the sluiceway under the wall, and a little later entered the British Legation.

Perhaps no beggar ever received so hearty a welcome, but it did not puff him up with vanity. He modestly made himself useful in many ways, until the Legation was relieved by the arrival of the armies from Tientsin on August 14th.

He is now with the missionaries in Peking, and it is to be hoped will receive a useful education. Then, with his brave heart and willing spirit, as well as his perseverance in the face of obstacles, what may he not accomplish for China?

On Calvary

A MOST interesting picture has recently been on exhibition at the Bowery Mission, No. 55 Bowery, New York City. It represents the scene of the Crucifixion, and was loaned by the artist, Mr. George Innes Jr., for the benefit of the Mission. Mr. Innes has never before consented to giving a public exhibition of the picture, and the men of the Bowery, and those interested in the Mission work, are the first to whom the artist has given this privilege.

The picture was painted in Paris a few years ago, and received a medal at the salon.
The artist has carried out his own original conception of the greatest event in the history of the world. There is an absence of all preconceived ideas of the scene; the awful suffering and death of the Christ are scarcely indicated, for the glory of completed Redemption fills all the air, and submerges in its wonderful light the Cross upon which the Saviour died. More attention is given to the landscape and the wonderful effects of light and shadow, than to the figures, which seemed dwarfed and rather insignificant in comparison. Calvary is in the distance, surmounted by the three crosses. That of the Saviour is invisible, through the radiance which comes somewhat like the ancient bow of promise falling from the clouds in beautiful opalescent coloring, making a halo in sharp contrast to the other parts of the scene, that are still in darkness. The cross of the penitent thief reflects something of this brightness, while that of the other malefactor stands black against the sky. A Roman soldier has driven the crowd of Jesus' friends away, and they are dispersed in groups at the foot of the hill.
A great fissure shows where the rocks were rent. Jerusalem is in darkness, and in the foreground is the sepulchre hewn out of a rock; a white dove flutters over the heads of two women standing near the entrance, and over all shines the light such as "never was on sea or land," while the darkness of night has settled over the city.

The sight of the picture seemed to create a profound impression upon the men for whose benefit it was placed in the Mission Hall, and the words of the superintendent were calculated to emphasize this impression, and carry home to the hearts of his listeners that it was not a dead Christ, but a living, loving Saviour, to whom they were invited to look for pardon and acceptance.

is related of a Finnish domestic in a West-tress that she was soon to be married.

The girl who was engaged to take her place word to her mistress-to-be that she would be able to begin her duties for at least a night after the date on which her predecessor was to be married. The maid decided to postpone the date of the wedding, she said she didn't mind getting married, a coming back for a time, until the other could assume her duties, and this was fully agreed upon, as the young man offered objection. Half an hour after the ceremony the girl was performing her customary duties, a her mistress said to her, smiling: "And suppose your husband has gone back to work, too, Matilda?" "Oh, no, indeed,

"PRAYING AMISS"

No Such Thing as Unheeded Prayer

IN a recent discourse at the City Temple, London, the Rev. R. J. Campbell gave utterance to some very striking thoughts on the subject of "Prayer that Seems in Vain." He said in substance:

There is a perplexing experience which is fairly common in the world—that of the silence of God. In some form it comes to us all. We are so markedly different in our experiences of the world and life and God, that no two people could say the same thing about prayer. But we all know what it is for prayer to be in vain. There is the experience of the unavailing search for God. Many people seem able to get on well without God. These people may have a certain fineness of character, but they do not leave room in their lives for an intense experience of the Most High.
Not so are the people of whom I am thinking. They spend months and years in the quest for God, but even they find that it brings little satisfaction. You wish you had some consciousness of the presence of the Divine in your life. Some men are born with the sense of God. They are his trustees in the world. They keep it occupied with the questions: Does he hear me? Can I find him? But others never obtain this sense of God. They may be his true servants, but until they stand before the throne, they have no vivid consciousness that he is in their lives at all.

Take the strong men here present, and most of them, when young, feel that there is something feeble and puerile about prayer.
They say, "Stand up to the foe, work, fight, and if you get beaten take the thrashing. If you lose, you lose, but don't go whining to man or God." To them I would say, There is no difference between work and prayer.
The praying men of history have not been the weakest men of history. Take the case of Mr. Gladstone, who knelt in his private room in prayer, as Tennyson tells us, before he went to the House of Commons. Mr.
Gladstone was no weakling. Think of the man who is hard hit in the battle of life. The last thing he thinks of now is praying, but at one time it was not so. Before his chronic disappointment began, he looked for answers to prayer. None came. Success has proved but a mirage in the desert, and it faded as he walked that way.

Some will pray for others who will never pray for themselves. Here, also, there are disappointments, and yet we read that "Everyone that asketh, receiveth." Let us get to grips with this promise. Receiveth what?
The very thing he asks for? Christ never said that. Something he receives; some equivalent, and usually more than an equivalent, of what he prays for. The man who prays for vengeance on his enemies receives his answer, for his prayer is apt to turn into a boomerang, and hurt himself. There is no such thing as the denial of a petition. It may be deflected; it is never refused. It always affects something in the world—an awful, yet blessed thought. Every movement of the human will does something—not perhaps what it was intended to do, but something. We may not see the result on this side of the tomb. The case is like that of a man who throws a pebble into the pond. He aims at a water-lily, and misses it, but the ripple shakes every flower on the lake.

Then, again, who is at the other end of your prayer? He is the same who cried on the cross: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" If Christ is at the other end, even of a foolish prayer, it will come back laden with blessing. In God's universe, what ought to be true is true. Make that one act of faith for your life, and if you find that after that your life is embittered, and your hopes shattered, come back and tell me so. The Author of that promise knew himself the experience of unanswered prayer. He prayed that the cup might pass from him. That request was refused, but where is he now? On the throne of his glory, more than conqueror. All high and unselfish prayer comes straight from heaven.

We are like a boy with a burning glass.
We stand in the open, catching the light of heaven and flinging it widely abroad. What we gain from and in prayer or in suffering, we offer back to God. Trust all this truth; it will help your life, and will make you strong.
Our dear Lord purchased the right to say "Everyone that asketh receiveth." Pray most when you feel least like praying. He knew what that meant. Some of you are crying out after God, when he is near you all the while. He wants you to feel alone sometimes, and go right through the dark valley like a man. Christian, in Bunyan's allegory, passed through the Valley of the Shadow amidst gruesome shapes and terrifying sounds; but he came into the light unscathed. Even if you say that you never have any vivid consciousness of God, that does not prove that God is not beautifully near to him, who is seeking to be right and true. God will never be nearer to you than he is to-day.

BAD DREAMS

Indicate Improper Diet, Usually Due to Coffee

One of the common symptoms of coffee poisoning is the bad dreams that spoil what should be restful sleep. A man who found the reason says:

"Formerly I was a slave to coffee. I was like a morphine fiend, could not sleep at night, would roll and toss in my bed and when I did get to sleep was disturbed by dreams and hobboblins, would wake up with headaches and feel bad all day, so nervous I could not attend to business.
My writing looked like bird tracks. I had sour belchings from the stomach, indigestion, heartburn and palpitation of the heart, constipation, irregularity of the kidneys, etc.

"Indeed, I began to feel I had all the troubles that human flesh could suffer, but when a friend advised me to leave off coffee, I felt as if he had insulted me. I could not bear the idea, it had such a hold on me, and I refused to believe it the cause.

"But it turned out that no advice was ever given at a more needed time, for I finally consented to try Postum and with the going of coffee and the coming of Postum all my troubles have gone and health has returned. I eat and sleep well now, nerves steadied down and I write a fair hand (as you can see), can attend to business again and rejoice that I am free from the monster Coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days trial of Postum in place of coffee will bring sound, restful, refreshing sleep. There's a reason.

Deafness Overcome

A Device That Is Scientific, Simple, Direct, and Instantly Restores Hearing in Even

The True Story of The Invention of Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums Told by George H. Wilson, the Inventor.

I was deaf from infancy. Eminent doctors, surgeons and ear specialists treated me at great expense and yet did me no good. I tried all the artificial appliances that claimed to restore hearing, but they failed to benefit me in the least. I even went to the best specialists in the world, but their efforts were unavailing.

My case was pronounced incurable!
I grew desperate; my deafness tormented me. Daily
I was becoming more of a recluse, avoiding the companionship of people because of the annoyance my deafness and sensitiveness caused me. Finally I began to experiment on myself, and after patient years of study, labor and personal expense, I perfected something that I found took the place of the natural ear drums, and I called it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, which I now wear day and night with perfect comfort, and do not even have to remove them when washing. No one can tell I am wearing them, as they do not show, and as they give no discomfort whatever, I scarcely know it myself.

With these drums I can now hear a whisper. I join in the general conversation and hear everything going on around me. I can hear a sermon or lecture from any part of a large church or hall. My general health is improved because of the great change my Ear Drums have made in my life. My spirits are bright and cheerful. I am a relieved, changed man.

Since my fortunate discovery it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any other such old-fashioned makeshift. My Common Sense Ear Drum is built on the strictest scientific principles, contains no metal, wires, or strings of any kind, and is entirely new and up to date in all respects. It is so small that no one can see it when in position, yet it collects all the sound waves and focuses them against the drum head, causing you to hear naturally and perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened.
It fits any ear from childhood to old age, male or female, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day and night without removal for any cause.

With my device I can overcome deafness in any person, no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gatherings in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. My invention not only overcomes, but at once stops the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. The greatest aural surgeons in the world recommend it, as well as physicians of all schools. It will do for you what no medicine or medical skill on earth can do.

I want to place my 190-page book on deafness in the hands of every deaf person in the world. I will gladly send it free to anyone whose name and address I can get. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains bona fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India, and the remotest islands.
I have letters from people in every station of life—ministers, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from my wonderful little device. You will find the names of people in your own town and state, many whose names you know, and I am sure that all this will convince you that the remedy for deafness has at last been solved by my invention.

WOMEN IN HEATHENDOM*

Faithful, Devoted and Successful Service Rendered by Women in the Mission Field

ONE of the most conspicuous examples of feminine magnanimity, is the rendering of the services to Paul, which he acknowledges in the passages associated with the topic. His epistles, in more than one instance, imply that he had not a very high opinion of women. The position to which he relegates them, bidding them be covered, be silent in the church, and be content to learn from their husbands at home, might, not unfairly, have led the women of his time to pay no attention to his wants; but they evidently ministered to his comfort and laid him under obligation. This was very creditable to them, and testifies to the sweet kindness which in every age has prompted them, in dealing with men, to forgive slights and serve those who have rebuffed them.

Paul's reference to "the women who have labored with me in the Gospel," would have a vastly wider meaning in our day than in his. Besides the women who in Christian lands have done noble service, there is the vast army of women who have braved perils and hardships to carry the Gospel to the heathen. Over seven thousand of them are now in the field, and a multitude of them, having given their lives to the service, are gone to their reward. What they have accomplished, their triumphs, their sufferings, and their courage even to the death, make up one of the most glorious chapters in the history of missions. As physicians, as teachers, as visitors in the homes, they have been of inestimable service. They have reached the wives and mothers in lands where social custom forbids the male missionary access to them. To their influence has been due the susceptibility of young men to Gospel teaching, through the training of the mothers, whom some woman missionary has led to Christ. They and they alone have had the power to reach the women of heathendom, and right faithfully and successfully have they done their work. It has often been repulsive, in not a few countries dangerous, but there has been no shrinking from it on woman's part. Sometimes alone, sometimes as the wife of a missionary, she has gone forth strong in faith, unwavering in her devotion, and patient and tender in all her consecrated service.

50,000 Prisoners Hear the Gospel

The Rev. R. C. Bowen, chaplain of King's County Penitentiary and Raymond Street Jail, Brooklyn, N. Y., has just closed three years of labor in these two institutions. In these two institutions, many are confined from one year's end to the other.

"It is doubtful," said the chaplain, "if those on the outside can fully comprehend the work of those who take the Gospel to these unfortunate people. Would you think that in Raymond Street Jail, on Sabbath mornings and Tuesday evenings, no less than 17,234 men and boys have attended religious services in the past three years? We have no chapel to meet in, but on the 'flats,' as the term is used, with a little raised platform for the organ, and then on the stone floor are placed a number of benches for our congregation, some of whom are coatless, some with hair unkempt, but all most attentive. Now go from here to Kings County Penitentiary, and everything is different. There we have a nice chapel, with pews, an altar and pulpit, giving it the appearance of a church auditorium. Here, during the past three years, on Sabbath afternoons, have gathered 33,023 persons in attendance on religious services, thus making, all told, in these two places over 50,000 prisoners during these three years. Many, no doubt, have heard the Word for the first time in these places. Then, too, if a record was kept of the private and personal conversations on religion with these people, in going from cell to cell, the total would reach thousands more. In all that time, there has never been a single unkind word spoken to me from any prisoner. From officials and keepers, and from all the judges in the courts, I have received the kindest co-operation, and if I have been able to let in any Gospel sunshine upon these unfortunate lives, it is due largely to those with whom I have been so fortunately associated."

CHRIST'S PASSOVERS

By MRS. M. BAXTER

IN the course of our Lord's ministry there were three Passover feasts. The first is recorded in John 2: 13-25. Obedient to the law (Exod. 34: 23), "Jesus went up to Jerusalem." No doubt he kept the Passover on this occasion with his disciples, in the same way as he did before he suffered. But he took occasion at this time to oppose the desecration of the Temple. "He found in the Temple [i.e., in the temple courts] those that sold oxen and sheep and doves." Of course, these things were needed for sacrifice. As he had said, "None shall appear before me empty" (Exod. 34: 20). But the Jews found that it was inconvenient to bring their own cattle or the produce of their land, so that they brought money, and bought in the courts of the Temple what they needed. Thus they studied their own convenience in the way of making offerings, and they encouraged the traders to do their business within the precincts of the Temple, which was holy to the Lord.

The Lord Jesus assumed a position of authority. It was his Father's house—he had so great a right there as he, and he should have had a voice in its direction which should prevail over his. So he drove out single-handed the beasts and the owners, and upset the money-changer's tables, saying, with an authority which took everyone by surprise, "Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise."

The second Passover during the course of his ministry is mentioned in John 6: 4: "Now, the Passover, the feast of the Jews, was at hand." (R. V.). If this is the same feast as is alluded to in John 5: 1, Jesus must have attended it. The chronology of John is not like that of a continuous history. The Gospel is rather a compilation of certain things which bear upon the Godhead of the Lord Jesus, and seem to have been written down as they were remembered. In any case, it was about the time of the second Passover during his ministry that our Lord, at Bethesda, taught and healed the people, who, it seems, were on their way up to Jerusalem for the Passover (John 6: 4, 5), and it was then he multiplied the loaves. At when the same multitude followed him to the other side of the lake, he taught them the great truth about himself as the Bread of Life, and again and again introduced the subject of the resurrection.

The third and last Passover was celebrated immediately before his suffering and death; and his resurrection, which is the guarantee of ours. Our Lord Jesus was already in Jerusalem; his brief triumph, when the multitude had hailed him as the Son of David, was over; his public discourses had been spoken, and he said to his disciples, "Ye know that after two days is the feast of the Passover, and the Son of Man is betrayed to be crucified." But even now the disciples did not realize that "thus it must be," for their eyes were still upon the outward glory, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (Acts 1: 17) which they had read of in the prophets, and they ignored the fact, so clear in all the prophets, that the national repentance of Israel must precede the national glory. Just while the Lord spoke thus to the disciples, the chief priests, scribes and others were consulting "how they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill him."

The disciples came to Jesus, saying to him, "Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover?" Oh, how little they knew that, before twenty-four hours were over, he would have prepared for them a way of salvation from sin and death which they should make known to the whole world! He directed them where to go. Mark and Luke, as usual, give the details: Christ's directions are always specific. He knew where he would find a man only too glad to put his highest chamber at the disposal of the Master. The large upper room was furnished and prepared, and they made ready the Passover. In the evening that company sat down together for the last time before the central fact of the world's history was accomplished.

OIL-GAS The WONDERFUL NEW FUEL

Ohioan's Remarkable Invention==Claimed to Be the Cheapest, Safest and Best Yet Found==Invents a New Oil-Gas Stove That Burns About 90% Air, 10% Oil-Gas==A Miniature Gas Works in the Home.

A God-Send to Women Folks--Every Family Can Now Have Gas for Cooking Made from Kerosene Oil at a Cost of Only About 1/2 Cent Per Hour.

How Delighted the Ladies Will Be to Save 1/3 to 1/2 on Fuel Bills--All the Drudgery of Carrying Coal, Wood, Ashes, Dirt, etc., and Be Able to Enjoy Cool Kitchens This Summer.

Most Wonderful Stove Ever Invented==Nothing Else Like It==Entirely Different From the Kind Seen in Stores.

HOW THE READERS CAN MAKE MONEY THIS SUMMER

From Cincinnati Christian Standard.

A GENIUS of Cincinnati has invented a new, scientific oil-gas generator that is proving a blessing to women folks, enabling them to cook with gas—relieving them of drudgery. Makes cooking and housework a delight, and at the same time often saves 1/2 to 1/3 in cost of fuel.

How often have many of the lady readers remarked that they would give anything to get rid of the drudgery of using the dirty coal and wood stoves—also the smoky oil wick stoves and their gasoline stoves, which are so dangerous and liable to cause explosions, or fire at any time.

Well, that day has arrived and a fine substitute has been discovered, and every family can now have gas fuel for cooking, baking, and heating, and not have their kitchens a hot, fiery furnace in summer, and be carrying coal and ashes—ruining their looks and health.

Thousands a Week

Upon calling at the factory, we found that this invention has caused a remarkable excitement all over the United States—that the factory is already rushed with thousands of orders, and evidently the Company's representatives and agents are making big profits, as they offer splendid inducements.

As will be noticed from the engraving, this OIL-GAS GENERATOR is entirely different from any other stove—although its construction is very simple—may be easily and safely operated, and is built on the latest scientific principles, having no valves, which is a marked improvement, as all valves are liable to leak, carbonize, clog up, or overflow.

By simply moving a knob, the oil is automatically fed to a small, steel burner bowl, or retort, where it is instantly changed into gas, which is drawn upwards between two red hot perforated steel chimneys, thoroughly mixed with air, and consumed, giving a bright, blue flame—hottest gas fire, similar in color and heating power to natural gas.

This invention has been fully protected in the United States Patent Office, and is known as the HARRISON VALVELESS WICKLESS AUTOMATIC OIL-GAS GENERATOR—the only one yet discovered that consumes the carbon and by-products of the oil.

The extremely small amount of Kerosene Oil that is needed to produce so large a volume of gas, makes it one of the most economical fuels on earth, and the reason for the great success of this Generator is based on the well known fact of the enormous expansiveness of oil-gas, when mixed with oxygen or common air.

Oil-Gas is proving so cheap that 15c. to 30c. a week should furnish fuel gas for cooking, for a small family.

Kerosene oil, from which oil-gas is made, may be purchased in every grocery—is cheap, and a gallon of it will furnish a hot, blue flame gas fire in the burner for about 18 hours, and as a stove is only used 3 or 4 hours a day in most families for cooking, the expense of operating it would be but little.

In addition to its cheapness is added the comfort, cleanliness—absence of soot, coal, dirt, ashes, etc. What pleasure to just turn on the oil—light the gas—a hot fire ready to cook. When through, turn it off. Just think; a little kerosene oil—one match—light—a beautiful blue gas flame—hottest fire—always ready—quick meals—a gas stove in your home.

It generates the gas only as needed—is not complicated, but simple—easily operated and another feature is its PERFECT SAFETY.

NOT DANGEROUS LIKE GASOLINE

And liable to explode and cause fire at any moment. This stove is so safe that you could drop a match in the oil tank and it would go out.

This Oil-Gas Stove does any kind of cooking that a coal or gas range will do—invaluable for the kitchen, laundry, summer cottage, washing, ironing, camping, etc. Splendid for canning fruit; with a portable oven placed over the burner splendid baking can be done.

Another Important Feature

Is the invention of a small Radiator Attachment, which placed over the burner, makes a desirable heating stove during the fall and winter, so that the old coal stove may be done away with entirely.

While at the factory in Cincinnati the writer was shown thousands of letters from customers who were using this wonderful oil-gas stove, showing that it is not an experiment, but a positive success, and giving splendid satisfaction, and as a few extracts may be interesting to the readers, we reproduce them:

L. S. Norris, of Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel—at least 50% to 75% over wood and coal."

Mr. H. Howe, of N. Y., writes: "I find the Harrison is the first and only perfect oil-gas stove I have ever seen—so simple any one can safely use it. It is what I have wanted for years. Certainly a blessing to human kind."

Mr. E. D. Arnold, of Neb., writes: "That he saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. That his gas range cost him $5.50 per month and the Harrison only $1.25 per month."

J. A. Shafer, of Pa., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stove makes an intense heat from a small quantity of oil—entirely free from smoke or smell—great improvement over any other oil stove. Has a perfect arrangement for combustion—can scarcely be distinguished from a natural gas fire."

Mr. H. B. Thompson, of Ohio, writes: "I congratulate you on such a grand invention to aid the poor in this time of high fuel. The mechanism is so simple—easily operated—no danger. The color of the gas flame is a beautiful dark blue, and so hot seems almost double as powerful as gasoline."

Mrs. J. L. Hamilton writes: "Am delighted—Oil-Gas Stoves so much nicer and cheaper than others—no wood, coal, ashes, smoke, no pipe, no wick, cannot explode."

Hon. Ira Eble, J. P., of Wis., writes: "Well pleased with the Harrison—far ahead of gasoline. No smoke or dirt—no trouble. Is perfectly safe—no danger of explosion like gasoline."

Chas. L. Bendeke, of N. Y., writes: "It is a pleasure to be the owner of your wonderful Oil-Gas Stove—no coal yard, plumbing—ashes or dust. One match lights the stove, and in 10 minutes breakfast is ready. No danger from an explosion—no smoke—no dirt—simply turn it off and expense ceases. For cheapness it has no equal."

Agents are doing fine—Making big money.

WONDERFUL QUICK SELLER

Geo. Robertson, of Me., writes: "Am delighted with Oil-Gas, so are my friends—took 12 orders in 3 days."

A. B. Slimp, of Texas, writes: "I want the agency—in a day and a half took over a dozen orders."

Edward Wilson, of Mo., writes: "The Harrison very satisfactory—Sold 5 stoves first day I had mine." J. H. Halman, of Tenn., writes: "Already have 70 orders."

This is certainly a good chance for the readers to make money this summer.

Hundreds of other prominent people highly endorse and recommend oil-gas fuel, and there certainly seems to be no doubt that it is a wonderful improvement over other stoves.

The writer personally saw these Oil-Gas Stoves in operation—in fact, uses one in his own home—is delighted with its working and after a thorough investigation can say to the readers that this Harrison Oil-Gas Stove made by the Cincinnati firm is the only perfect burner of its kind.

It is made in three sizes—1, 2 or 3 generators to a stove. They are made of steel throughout—thoroughly tested before shipping—sent out complete—ready for use as soon as received—nicely finished with nickel trimmings, and as there seems to be nothing about it to wear out, they should last for years. They seem to satisfy and delight every user and the makers fully guarantee them.

HOW TO GET ONE.

All the lady readers who want to enjoy the pleasures of a gas stove—the cheapest, cleanest and safest fuel—save 1/3 to 1/2 on fuel bills and do their cooking, baking, ironing and canning fruit at small expense should have one of these remarkable stoves.

Space prevents a more detailed description, but these oil-gas stoves will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and satisfactory properties.

If you will write to the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 5695 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask for their illustrated pamphlet describing this invention and also letters from hundreds of delighted users you will receive much valuable information.

The price of these stoves is remarkably low, only $3.00 up. And it is, indeed, difficult to imagine where that amount of money could be invested in anything else that would bring such saving in fuel bills, so much good health and satisfaction to the wives.

DON'T FAIL TO WRITE TO-DAY

for full information regarding this splendid invention.

The World Mfg. Co. is composed of prominent business men of Cincinnati, are perfectly responsible and reliable, capital $100,000.00, and will do just as they agree. The stoves are just as represented and fully warranted.

Don't fail to write for Catalogue.

BIG WAGES MADE

The firm offers splendid inducements to agents, and an energetic man or woman having spare time can get a good position, paying big wages, by writing them at once and mentioning this paper.

A wonderful wave of excitement has swept over the country, for where shown these Oil-Gas Stoves have caused great excitement. Oil-Gas fuel is so economical and delightful that the sales of these Stoves last month were enormous and the factory is rushed with thousands of orders.

Many of the readers have spare time, or are out of employment, and others are not making a great deal of money, and we advise them to write to the firm and secure an agency for this invention. Exhibit this stove before 8 or 10 people and you excite their curiosity, and should be able to sell 5 or 8 and make $10.00 to $15.00 a day. Why should people live in penury or suffer hardships for the want of plenty of money when an opportunity of this sort is open?

THESE pictures of Joseph Edward Kradoska, Jr., of 1913 East Willard St., Philadelphia, illustrate his wonderful change on ESKAY'S FOOD.

He was born April 1st, 1902, and his weight at birth was considerably under normal. For five months his mother tried to nurse him, until he became reduced to a mere skeleton, without hope of recovery, as shown in the lower picture. From the moment ESKAY'S FOOD was given him he improved steadily in health and strength, without a day's setback or illness up to the time the second picture was taken, March 1st, 1904 (shown at top), when, at 11 months, he weighed 25 lbs., heavier and stronger than the average healthy baby at that age.

ESKAY'S FOOD modifies cow's milk by breaking up the tough, cheesy masses into soft flocculent curds like mother's milk. The egg supplies albumen, or the tissue building element. The sugar of milk supplies the heat and energy producing elements, and the whole assures a perfect nutrient, especially for weak stomachs. No other food compares with it. These are briefly the reasons why ESKAY'S FOOD is the food for your baby. This boy, as well as thousands of others in ruddy health, substantiates our claims.

"The only Food served to the babies visiting the World's Fair at St. Louis. Call at our Booth, Aisle A, No. 71 Agricultural Building."

Let us send you our book, "How to Care for the Baby," and generous samples of ESKAY'S FOOD for trial.

I SELL REAL ESTATE

No matter what it is worth or in what town, city, state or territory
it is located.

When I tell you that I can sell real estate for cash, I don't mean that I can sell a property for $10,000 that is worth only $5,000. I don't mean that I can sell an old, run-down property to a person who wants to buy a modern, up-to-date home.

I can't perform miracles. I mean that I can do just what I have been doing for over eight years—selling all kinds of real estate in all parts of the country at

GOOD, FAIR PRICES

If you want to sell your property (no matter what it is worth or where it is located) and are willing to accept a reasonable price, then I want to handle it for you. If you are asking a higher price than any reasonable person could be expected to pay, I don't want to touch the property.

I have offices in principal cities from Boston to San Francisco. I have hundreds of representatives throughout the country. I am spending over $100,000 a year for the purpose of bringing the man who wants to buy in communication with the man who wants to sell. I am certainly able to judge the merits of your property. I want you to send me a description of your property, including your lowest cash price, and if you will do this I will write you a letter of advice telling you about the market for this kind of property, and giving you the best method for making a quick cash sale.

DO IT TO-DAY

If you want to buy any kind of a property in any part of the country, tell me just what you want. The magnitude of my business enables me to offer you many advantages which no other broker can possibly offer. I believe I can fill your requirements very promptly and save you some money at the same time.

Women, What Will You Give to Be Well —perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed, graceful body alone can give?

WILL YOU GIVE FIFTEEN MINUTES A DAY? If you will, you can be free—you can be graceful—you can be lovable and wholesome; you can have bounding, buoyant, vibrant health which will make the world look sweeter to you and you will look sweeter to the world.

There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood so lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and to wield influence.

YOU CAN BE WELL WITHOUT DRUGS

It is two years this month since I began to teach women the principles of perfect health through mail instructions, and my success has been marvelous. I cannot tell you how happy it makes me to realize that I have relieved over 7,000 women of all sorts of physical ailments by simply strengthening the vital organs, the nerves, the heart, and the lungs. I simply teach them the laws of nature. Their brains are clearer, their cheeks are rosy, their step is buoyant, they learn how to breathe, and they express that buoyancy and vivacity of life which is the crown of American womanhood. Surely what I have done for others I can do for you. My work cultivates that distinguished carriage and bearing which bespeak culture and refinement.

True attractiveness is in perfect health, grace of movement, free and wholesome thoughts. These are your birthright and may be retained by simply putting yourself in harmony with Nature.

I can do more for you than medicine can do. I can give you a Clear Brain, a Quick Perception and New Lease of Life by simply strengthening the vital organs.

I can take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build up Thin Necks, Chests, and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you just what I feel I can do for you, and I will send you an instructive leaflet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this leaflet and nothing for my information in regard to your case. If you have not time to write me of your case to-day, and really desire information in regard to my work, cut out this advertisement, giving me your name and address on the line below, and I will send it to you.

A CORSET IS NOT NEEDED FOR A GOOD FIGURE

The following extracts from two of my pupils' letters to my desk as I write:

"I have grown from a nervous wreck to a state of good, quiet nerves."

"I have never felt perfectly well. I think, you have relieved me of indigestion and constipation which have bothered me for years. Since you have relieved me of the troubles, I have gained thirty pounds weight and have the throat trouble which refused to come with medicine."

I will strengthen the Stomach and Nerves so that you food will nourish you. Strengthen the Liver, Kidneys and Intestines so that the impurities are thrown off from the system. Stimulate a Sluggish Circulation and set the Blood Bounding through your veins; that the rheumatism twinges will disappear and you will feel warm and comfortable. Strengthen Weak Heart or Lung. Reduce Superfluous Flesh, or Round off your Figure; Relieve you of Weakness, Aching Backs and Headaches.

PRESIDENT PALMA AND HIS CABINET IN SESSION

Stereographs, copyright, 1902, by Underwood & Underwood.

CUBA'S SECOND BIRTHDAY

The Young Republic is Now Two Years Old, and Giving Signs of Progress and Prosperity

THE Republic of Cuba had a birthday May 20. It was two years old. The Republic may be said to be still in the cradle; but it certainly is a healthy young Republic. Time flies so rapidly that most persons forget what was happening two years ago. They should not do so, because everything was to the credit of the United States and the American people.

It was at noon on May 20, 1902, that the Stars and Stripes came down from the Palace in Havana and the new flag of the Cuban Republic went up. This country had been administering Cuban affairs under military authority from the time when the Spaniards were compelled, at the point of the bayonet, to give up the island over which they had held sway for four hundred years. The military authority was form, rather than substance; for what the United States really was doing was to give civil administration till the Cuban people were ready to manage their own affairs.

Some persons thought it was a mistake for the United States to turn the island over to its own inhabitants. They were afraid the Cubans would make a failure of self-government. Perhaps some of them, too, were a little greedy for land, and wanted the Pearl of the Antilles to become American territory. But this was not the wish of the American people; the United States had pledged independence to Cuba and they wanted the pledge kept.

The Stars and Stripes on that day, May 20, 1902, were furled by Gen. Wood, who had been the Military Governor, and with his aid, also, the Cuban flag was unfurled. Afterward President Roosevelt secured from Congress the reciprocity which President McKinley had promised Cuba, and the sugar and other products of the Island imported into the United States now pay lower duties than similar products from other countries. Thus the United States at every stage has kept faith.

When the Stars and Stripes came down, and the authority of the United States was withdrawn, there was a Cuban government ready to carry on the affairs of the Island. A constitution had been adopted and a president and Congress had been chosen. There was no provision for the appointment of a Supreme Court, which was afterward carried out. So the Cuban Republic was, and is, very much like the United States in its form of government. President Tomas Estrada

Palma, who, during many years of exile in the United States, had been working for Cuban independence and teaching school, is rightly called "The Schoolmaster President."

The new government started off under many difficulties. Times were hard, because the price of sugar was very low and many of the inhabitants could not find work; but there were no outbreaks, and the people showed much self-restraint during this most trying period. Slowly the conditions got better, and last December, when the reciprocity treaty was ratified, a marked improvement began. Cuba is now happy, prosperous and contented. Many Americans are going there and are doing very well.

While the United States kept its word with Cuba, it also should be said that the new Republic kept faith with this country. What was known as the Platt Amendment provided that the paramount influence of the United States should be recognized; that it should have the right to intervene in certain cases, and that land should be ceded it for naval stations. Treaties were ratified, carrying out these stipulations, and it is only a short time since the United States took full possession of the naval station at Guantanamo, a magnificent bay at the eastern end of the Island. There our flag still floats, for the naval station is to all intents and purposes United States territory; but the flag floats with the acquiescence and good-will of the Cuban people.

The credit of the new Republic is good; this is the best evidence of confidence in the Government. A loan of thirty-five million dollars was authorized to pay the soldiers who had fought for the independence of the Island. This loan was taken by a New York banking-house, and it is said that in allotting the bonds, the demand was so great that applicants received only one-fourth of what they had asked.

Under the Cuban Republic there is not only freedom of worship, which did not exist under the Spanish rule, but there is also marked friendship shown to Protestantism. This is more than mere religious toleration. The different denominations have been given a warm welcome in their missionary labors, and now are firmly established in Havana and other parts of the Island.

Of course, Cuba, being like the United States, has politics and elections, and such things. Sometimes, as with us, politics becomes warm. In February, members of Congress were elected, and some of the elections were contested. Occasionally there is news from Havana about "breaking a quorum," and disorders in the Congress. It reads just like the news from Washington, when our own Congress is engaged in partisan struggles. But generally the Havana dispatches, in telling of the doings in the Congress, state that the moderates are in control, indicating that the Republic is pretty conservative.

Altogether, the Cuban Republic on its second birthday makes a good showing. It justifies all that its well-wishers in the United States hoped for it, and promised for it. The American people will wish it many other birthdays.

Laws for the Isthmian Canal Zone

RULES and regulations for the administration of the Canal have been under consideration in Washington lately, and are now officially promulgated. All the acts of the Commission will be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War and the President. Military affairs on the territory adjoining the Canal, and known as "the zone," will be in charge of Gen. George W. Davis, U. S. A., as Military Governor. No troops will be sent to the Isthmus at present, but the American marines now there will remain to preserve peace and order. Gen. Davis has authority to appoint one judge for the judicial work on the Isthmus.

The President's formal instructions to the Panama Canal Commission are embodied in a letter to the Secretary of War. These instructions are substantially as follows:

The Commission to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the United States Canal zone, and for the military, civil, and political affairs of that territory, until the close of the 58th Congress; to establish a Civil Service system for all appointments; to make surveys, borings, designs, plans, etc.; to advertise all contracts for work on the Canal; to acquire by purchase or condemnation all lands and other property essential to the work; to provide an accurate system of bookkeeping and accounting; and to make requisition on the Secretary of War for all necessary funds. Due provision is made for securing the rights of the inhabitants of the Isthmian Canal zone in their persons, property, and religion. Present laws will continue, until changed or annulled by the Commission. The latter is given power to exclude all undesirable persons from the Canal zone, including idiots, insane, epileptics, paupers, criminals, professional beggars, persons with contagious diseases, anarchists, felons, etc.

As the United States now owns sixty-nine seventieths of the stock of the Panama Railroad, it will control the policy of the road, and the members of the Canal Commission will be on the Board of Directors. No lottery scheme of any kind will be tolerated within the zone.

Stereograph, copyright, 1904, by Underwood & Underwood.

BOY SOLDIERS OF THE NEW REPUBLIC

Parties of engineers will be sent to the Isthmus from time to time, as the work proceeds, to relieve those on duty. Col. Gorgas and the other sanitary experts who went on the first trip to Panama, will return for another inspection, and to put into effect the plans they have recommended. These plans contemplate establishing a system of waterworks for the houses along the canal, and a determined war on mosquitoes as plague and fever breeders. Admiral Walker has been advised by the Agricultural Department of the success of experiments with copper sulphate in connection with the work of sanitation on the Isthmus, and the Admiral says the commission would probably give the solution a trial.

Affairs in the new Republic of Panama are progressing smoothly. All branches of the brand-new government seem to be fairly well adjusted, and are running with very little friction. The City of Panama looks as quiet and peaceful and as contentedly happy as though it had never witnessed an upheaval of any kind, to say nothing of a revolution, which has completely changed the destinies of the Isthmus and its population. General Huertas, Commander-in-Chief of the little Panama Army, is one of the most popular Isthmian heroes, and the part he took in the recent rebellion is still a theme of admiration. In the army the Republic are several companies of very young boys, mere children in fact, who are undergoing the regular drill, with the purpose of some day becoming distinguished as heroes. These little fellows (it is sad to see them bearing arms and training for war), are unquestionably plucky. Their officers say some of them have already distinguished themselves, and that, as a whole, the juvenile force of child-soldiers are as much to be depended on as any adults in the military service of the Republic.

Soon the Canal work will be under way, and the people of the Isthmus are already beginning to look hopefully forward to the coming times of prosperity, under the shelter and protection of the greater Republic.

Planning a Great Peace Congress

IT is a disgrace to both England and America that Chile and Argentina have advanced to a stage where they have demolished their fortresses and sold their battleships, in order to build more schools. They have erected on the highest point of the Andes a great statue of Jesus Christ, indicating that peace hereafter will be their motto. It is a pity that this country should spend millions of dollars for battleships, when the whole South is clamoring for education.

All this and much more of interest, which sounded like a hint of the coming millennial peace, was told at a recent meeting in New York, preliminary to the thirteenth International Peace Congress which will be held in Boston, on October 3, 1904. The coming Congress bids fair to be the largest and most important international gathering of the kind ever held in this country.

At the preliminary meeting in New York, Mr. Edwin D. Mead, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Thirteenth International Peace Committee, made a stirring address, in the course of which he used the language already quoted, concerning the action of the South American Republics. Mr. Oscar S. Straus, the chairman, was the next speaker. He said that no Administration since the beginning of this Republic, had done more for the advancement of peace, than the present one. It had sent the first case that opened the doors of the Court of Arbitration at the Hague, and it also had the Venezuela controversy carried to that court. The speaker said that the Russo-Japanese war is a cloud upon all that the last Peace Congress did.

It is hardly a case that could have been submitted to arbitration. Yet I believe that this war will move forward the dial of peace, and accentuate the fact that this spirit of expansion and appropriation of the lands of a weaker nation must end, and end forever in all the continents of the world. The neutral nations are now united by a close bond. They can no longer submit to the robber principle that to the victor belong the spoils. That principle can no longer be used, because the interests of the neutral nations involved are such that a blow inflicted on one nation is felt throughout the world.

I believe that The Hague Tribunal may yet be invoked to decide the issues of this war, and that the neutral nations will have something to say as to how the spoils shall be divided. Who knows but what this war in the Far East will be the strongest possible proof of the spirit which actuated the twenty-six nations at the last Peace Congress, that each and every nation must promote the cause of peace for its own highest interest?

The first and only International Peace Congress held in this country assembled in Chicago in 1893. Although Americans have been conspicuously in favor of it, it was an Englishman who first conceived the idea of a Universal Peace Congress. In 1841, Josiah Sturge, a well-known philanthropist, visited the United States, and met in New England many of the anti-slavery leaders — Sumner, Channing, Garrison and others, to whom Mr. Sturge commended his plan for a Universal Peace Congress. This plan was received with great favor. The American Peace Society endorsed it, the English Peace Society took it up, and the first International Peace Society met in London in 1843. In 1849 Victor Hugo was president of the Congress which was held in Paris, on which occasion the idea of a permanent International Tribunal was advocated, which was finally realized at the Hague. In 1889 the Peace Congresses were revived, and have been held regularly almost every year since.

This movement is just now appealing to thoughtful men and women of all nations, and the recent meeting in New York but foreshadows the great gathering in Boston next autumn. A communication has been received from Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, one of the French members of the Hague Court, and leader of the Arbitration movement in France, stating that he will attend the Congress, along with a strong French delegation. Members of the Hague Tribunal of different nationalities will also address the meeting.

The World's Convention in Jerusalem

It Receives and Applauds THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace Memorial

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT)

JERUSALEM, April 20.

THE World's International Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem was a grand success.

On the last night, addresses were made by a general in King Menelik's army, the ancient Mayor of Jerusalem, the Secretary of Public Instruction, and a Censor, as well as by noted Englishmen and Americans.

I am glad to report that I handed the Peace Memorial to the President of the Convention, and asked that it be presented to the Convention. He replied that it should first go to the Committee on Resolutions. It was afterwards presented to the Convention as a part of the Committee's report, and it was loudly applauded by the Convention.

I was chosen to present the subject of Temperance to the Convention. My articles for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, giving the details of the Convention work, will be sent to you soon.

MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

Following is the Peace Memorial forwarded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, presented to the Convention by the Committee on Resolutions:

A MEMORIAL

To the President, Officers, and Delegates of the World's Sunday School Convention, in Session in Jerusalem.

ELLOW CHRISTIANS: Two hundred and fifty thousand lovers of peace in the United States of America, representing every denomination in the Church of Christ throughout the Union, respectfully address you through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the urgent request that, in the course of your deliberations at this Convention, you may find an opportunity to give formal expression to the sentiment of your distinguished assembly on the subject of peace and arbitration.

At the opening of the Hague Conference five years ago, the hopes of the Christian world were bright with expectation. Thirty nations were signatories to the Hague Convention. It was the purpose of those who planned that efficient movement, to create a Permanent International Tribunal, for the adjudication of all cases of dispute that might arise among the signatory powers, and for the extension of the principle of arbitration to all lands. That tribunal has been ignored; nations have gone to war, and thousands of human beings have been needlessly sacrificed in the intervening years. Even now, two of the signatory Powers are at war with each other, and still wider conflicts are impending. Armaments by land and sea have increased, and the burden of taxation for war purposes has become in many lands almost intolerable.

We respectfully and most earnestly urge your distinguished body to place itself on record by an appeal to the leading governments, through their several State Departments, that they should again unite in the practical application of the principle laid down at the Hague Conference; and that all future causes of dispute should be carried to that Tribunal, instead of being referred to the savage arbitrament of war. We ask you to let it be known everywhere that your distinguished body regards war as a brutal relic of barbarism, which settles no principle, and decides no question save that of relative brutal force. The cry of a great majority of the fourteen hundred million souls who constitute the earth's population to-day is for peace, and for the abolition of war; for peace to pursue their various vocations in quietness and safety; for peace to enjoy the liberty and prosperity which they desire for their families; for peace that they may dwell in quietness in their own lands, and enjoy the friendship and good-will of their neighbors; for peace that they may live their lives in reasonable security, surrounded by the comfort and happiness which the Almighty has promised to all who trust Him and look to Him for protection.

And we respectfully submit that it is within your province and power, as an assembly representative of the Christian population of many lands, met for beneficent purposes, to exert an influence in this direction that may lead to most blessed results.

We trust that your distinguished body may be led by the Holy Spirit to act with wisdom and courage in all things, and that all your deliberations in Convention may inure to the benefit of the whole world.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Our Pilgrims in Paul's Country

The Mediterranean is the most classic of all seas. But this characteristic is of secondary interest to the company on the Grosser Kurfurst. To us the attraction of it is the relation of its cities and islands to Bible history. Our good ship brings us to Smyrna, in which was located one of the seven churches. It is a fresh and beautiful city of three hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, Greeks, Jews and Moslems. We do not tarry, but take the train to Ephesus, fifty miles away. The ruins of the ancient city are two and a-half miles from the station. A light rain is falling, but several hundred pilgrims fall into little groups, and walk together, while a few ride on horses and donkeys. The rain ceases as we halt for lunch just outside the old theatre.

After lunch, we arrange ourselves inside the theatre and services are begun, but are interrupted by the heavy rain.

We leave the theatre, and pass out into the ruins of what was the principal street of Ephesus beautiful even in its decay. In conversation, we recall the ministry of Paul in Ephesus, and the uproar caused by the silversmith, and Paul's final departure. Returning to Smyrna, we climb the Acropolis, and visit the grave of Polycarp, where a tall cypress tree stands guard.

We are under sail again, and are up early in the morning that we may catch a passing glimpse of Patmos. Our captain considerably slows the vessel. Along the rail is a row of eager faces, and we talk to each other of that Lord's Day when John heard the voice of God "as a great trumpet," and saw the vision of Jesus in the midst of the golden candlesticks.

The island disappears in the distance, and we find ourselves following the watery way of Paul as he journeyed with Sopater, Aristarchus, Secundus, Gaius, Timotheus, Tychicus, and Trophimus, toward Jerusalem, bearing the good-will and gifts of money from the Christians of Macedonia. Paul and his companions passed by Coos and Rhodes — perhaps stopped there for the loading or unloading of the vessel.

We continue on our way, and for two hours or more view the island of Cyprus, and recall in thought Bible reading and conversation, how Paul and Barnabas preached the Gospel there. The morning following finds us in the harbor at Beyrout, and we have come to the point where we must bid good bye to the veteran missionary Dr. Henry Jessup, who, together with his wife and daughter, have journeyed thus far with us. Several instructive and delightful addresses have been made by Dr. Jessup. Other missionaries have joined us along the way, at Constantinople, Smyrna, etc. Generous gifts of money have been made by the members of the cruise, to the missions thus represented, certainly not less than $1,200, besides purchases of lace and embroideries made by Armenian widows and girls of mission schools, amounting to as much more.

It was a part of the plan of the committee arranging this cruise that Sunday School workers and missionaries should come into a closer bond of sympathy. To this end a great meeting is held in the chapel of the Syrian Protestant College in Beyrout, Dr. Howard Bliss, the President of the college, being in the chair. For Christian enthusiasm, noble sentiments and eloquence, that meeting cannot be surpassed. Lunch is served upon the campus, and there is lemonade, flavored with rose, and cooled with the snows of Lebanon.

Beyrout is the point of departure for trips to Damascus, Galilee and Samaria, and for those going overland to Jerusalem. There is sadness as we prepare to separate for a few days, and only seventeen of our number are left upon the ship, some being ill and others too aged to take the trip.

A LITTLE TALK ON CHURCH LOYALTY

HERE is no organization making so much waste of its talents as that church which is practically preaching to empty pews. Many localities are over-churched, enfeebling their powers by supporting too many weak churches to satisfy slight denominational preferences. In such cases, the energies of the people are wasted in their support, instead of impressing the truths of salvation for the saving of souls. Combination in one or possibly two strong churches is more effective than six or eight weak ones. Besides, the difference in expense could be applied to field work in the parish homes with gratifying results. There never has been a time when it was more necessary than now that the church should employ its best talent to formulate and put into operation, plans to cause influence to reach every home. Former methods to reach masses need to be revised. The Sunday newspaper, if it is not to be stopped, should be made a vehicle to attract its readers to obedience to God and Christ our Saviour. Many churches are demanding services from employees, who would be glad to attend church on the Sabbath but are thus prevented. The church should adopt methods to feed these hungry souls. I found it beneficial as an employer, to hold out services of prayer and song among my employees Saturday of each week, and then, at its close, to make distribution of such papers as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and others, which were eagerly sought after and carried to their homes. What methods the church should adopt should be decided upon after the most prayerful and careful deliberation.

While the church has many faithful members who are alive to the situation and are accomplishing great results, my experience leads me to believe that the ordinary church member is too indifferent or too sentimental to comply with business rules. He little comprehends that to be a faithful follower of his Lord and Master, he should be engaged in some work in his Lord's vineyard. Many often think they are conferring a favor on their pastor by merely attending divine service. They have no conscientious rules, and but slight regard for Church Covenant. They contribute a limited amount, if they are suited with the minister; but the great work of the church is foreign to their ideas. The family altar in many church members' homes has been abandoned, and, as a result, the young are growing up in indifference, and, in some instances, veritable infidels are coming from under the church member's roof. This apparent indifference of members reveals the neglect of home prayer. In consequence of the neglect of church obligations, the world judges the church as insincere. In business transactions, sales cannot be made if the purchaser considers the seller insincere; neither can a follower of Christ be a factor for good, with insincerity in his acts.

In some churches financial methods are in many respects unbusinesslike, being supported along sentimental lines so crude that no other institutions could survive such conditions. Increased demands are awakening a desire among many for an equitable method of equalizing the burdens. We are giving trial to a new system, which promises success. At an annual meeting, we authorized the trustees to estimate the expense requirements for the year, and to apportion to each member such amounts as the trustees, in their judgment, thought the member would be willing to pay. This amount was filled in on a printed card explaining the method, with a coupon card attached, on which the member should write his name agreeing to the amount assessed, or if he did not agree, to state what he would pay, by weekly, monthly, or quarterly payments, mailed to the church treasurer. Envelopes, too, in every pew, to be used in payment each Sabbath. Then a large card, with a space in the first column at the left hand, is provided. In this space, the names of all the members of the church are written alphabetically, and opposite each name is an extended line, in which are fifty-two blank spaces reaching across the card. For each payment a mark is made in one of these extended spaces weekly, and the card is hung in the vestibule of the church for the inspection of all. This shows who are supporting the church, but does not reveal the amounts. When the spaces are all marked, the card shows that the member has made full payment. By this system, the member who pays the "widow's mite," five cents a week, is credited equally with the one who contributes one hundred dollars or more a year. The account is open to public inspection, and at the same time no one but the treasurer and trustees knows the amount any one is contributing.

The maintenance of the church should not only be regarded as a duty, but a pleasure, in both labor and support. If it is a sin to be disloyal to one's country, it is a still greater sin to be disloyal and indifferent to our Divine Master.

Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.*

Transfigured Lives

JOY had come unto Jesus. Joy which was deep and abiding, because it was allied to the highest and the holiest sources of joy. And in the hour of his transfiguration, when his glory bathed the slopes of Hermon with a radiance whiter than Hermon's whitest snow, he overcame the sharpness of death, and looking to the other Mount of Calvary, he spoke with calm and majestic authority of the deace he should accomplish at Jerusalem.

Wrapped in the splendors of his spiritual estate he held intercourse with his Father and the spirits of the just made perfect.

This culmination was the outcome of an orderly progression by a perfected soul. When the Master was twelve years of age he assumed spiritual independence. His mother's guardian love gave way and he entered into that intimacy with the will of heaven which was to be unbroken to the end. The dimensions of the noblest life the world can ever know grew apace during the silent years at Nazareth. He became subject to his parents, and he grew daily in physical attainments. This was a part of the programme of his earthly career. We see him at thirty, sitting solitary on the bleak rock in the dreary wilderness, where he did battle in an awful defiance of hell, and after the temptations had swept over his uninjured soul, the angels of peace and power ministered unto him.

Christ's Glory Revealed

So he came to this holy hill whose light has gone forth to all the nations. He came to be transfigured as the peasant who had assumed the prophets' robe and the Messiah's mission. The excellency within him could no longer be concealed, and as Waterloo was won at Eton, so the grave was overcome at Mount Hermon. What if the Cross stood on a neighboring hill and the pathway to it was a short one. Tragedy was lost in triumph, and beyond the evil and hate of sin of the world. St. Peter expressed the feelings of all, and said: "Lord, it is good for us to be here."

These great days of our pilgrimage cannot be effaced from memory. They are the oases in the desert where we drink of the sweet waters and rest in the grateful shade. But is it not our unfortunate tendency to unduly emphasize the humiliation of life, and forget its transfiguring moments? Even devotional literature has a tinge of melancholy, and often our search after God is a cry of despair. Pessimism plays havoc with men and women of the northern regions. Our moods of sadness, our useless regret, our corroding remorse, are put to the front; we advertise sorrow and we discount joy. For the music of life is not only a funeral march with muffled beat, it is meant by our Heavenly Father's love to be a sweep of progress, when on faith's strong eagle pinion we rise, and fight our passage to the skies and scale the hills of God.

Ever and anon our captivity is shattered, and the chafe of our bondage ceases to distress us. We move out of our self-appointed dungeon and stand free in the living air, and bathed in the golden sunshine. We hear above the repinings and the strife, the call of our Conqueror bidding us with him lead captivity captive and ascend to the banquet of love. It is easy in these high places to obey the apostolic exhortation, "Rejoice in the Lord alway, and again I say rejoice."

Hours of Transfiguration

A friend comes back from a foreign shore. A loved child or honored parent is restored to health; a sinner knows he has been plucked out of the pit of destruction; a doubter feels that faith is more easy and intelligent, a friendship is formed which leads to prosperity of soul. These and a thousand other causes arouse our thanksgiving; they bring us here to-day to greet the risen and glorified Redeemer, and we cry aloud, "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like unto them that dream."

These moments are to be sacredly cherished, they are like unto the angels' food upon which you may travel in the after times. Treasure them, for their loving kindness is better than life. They sweep into the soul as the tides cover the banks of estuaries and rivers, they lift the burden, and float you out into a wide and pleasant sea, and send you forward to fresh spiritual adventures. Such goodness and mercy attend us all, invest our every condition with their compensating power, and new every morning, they are repeated every evening, and they endure to the end.

You hardly realize this, and you will ask why it is that these transfiguring hours are for you so scanty, so few and far between. Oh, dull vision of wilful perversion! It is our spiritual incapacity which fills us with the sense of evil, and shuts out the superior sense of goodness. Men provoke their own misery, and passing by the place which God appoints for their healing, with desperate resolution they seek the darkness.

Is it an unpardonable temerity to say that God intends you to be nobly happy? And your peace is to be as a river, no frothy episode of passing pleasure, no temporary effort to cheat a gloomy fate. It is an underlying possession of your soul's innermost life undisturbed by the surface agitations. You were born to it, and the heaven which lies about men in their infancy is nearer to the original plan of your life than the hell we too often create in our after days.

That freshness, that vitality, we all remember, and the dew of youth can be restored. For it is God's free gift, the gift of his grace, the conquest of Jesus, and made over by him to every believer. You can use this grace divine, and, first and best, use it by a constant search after God in Christ Jesus.

Think of the single trait in the character of Jesus which gives him his pre-eminence. He is the one absolute type of the purely religious being. He shows us at every stage in his career how a holy mind rises to a God-like power, and tramples under foot all opposition of evil.

When I think of God he is above and far away, and man is beneath and very helpless. But Jesus mediates between the Divine and the human, representative both, and hence revealer of both. He shone on that mount, and he shines in the ages as the light of life and the hope of the race. There is no foul no and dark cranny where his illuminating healing beam have not penetrated. There is no cause for tears which he cannot remove. There is no sin he does not pardon. There is no burden he will not help you to bear. You can overcome in his overcoming, and you can grow in his boundless expanse, and you can enter into a thory in his risen power.

Companionship of Saints

But Jesus was not transfigured alone. Moses and Elias were there also. And the Apostles saw the because in reality there is no barrier between the good whether in heaven or on earth.

One family, we dwell in him,

One church, above, beneath.

Though now divided by the stream—

The narrow stream of death.

So sang Charles Wesley, and he had scriptural warrant for his sweet lyric. You meet in this church, the living Jesus, for we have not erected a mausoleum, but a temple for his living presence. And coming here to-day you have come, not only to this visible audience but to the innumerable company of the angels, and to God, the Judge of all, and to the spirits just men made perfect.

The cloud of witnesses is here, from whose eye we would gladly hide our baseness and our failure. There are the saints who from their labors rest, and here are those blessed agents of our piety who have passed on to await our coming and without us will not be made perfect. We think of them really present, and say:

Be near us when we climb or fall,

Ye watch, like God, the rolling hours

With larger, other eyes than ours,

To make allowance for us all.

Surely it is good for us to be here.

Again, earthly companionships aid the joy of living. That social circle on Mount Hermon made the light to shine which overcame the night. There stood the central figure, the Blessed One, and with him Moses, type of the legislator, and Elias, type of the reformer. Around them sat in worshiping wonder the apostolic three—Peter, James and John. No one is surprised that on that night the glory of the Lord was revealed, and that all flesh has since seen it together. For God's presence is found in patches and poverty, on the moor and the hillside, among the lowly and the obscure. It does not depend on palaces and purple. It makes existence sweet for the man at the oar and in the mine, and the woman who is the joyful mother of children, and busy with domestic duties. You shall not find it if you seek great things for yourself, the restless will who hurries to and fro, bitten by the narrowing lust for gold, is never happy, never contented.

Men and women who fearfully forget themselves in pleasure's whirl, come to no transfiguring place and hear no voice saying, "This is my Son, obey him."

All Relations Ennobled

Bring life's relations to Mount Hermon. Place literature, art, science, the drama, the day of rest, the law of the State, upon this high ground, and view them all in the light of the presence of Jesus. Enter into marriage and no friendship where he cannot come submit to no habits his Word will not sanction.

Then, and only then, life will lose its vulgar note, its frowzy appearance, and the noblest ministers will walk upon you hourly, and communion with the highest shall be yours. Go out into this glad morning, overarched by the sky of the spring, with reawakened life casting its mantle over all the created works of God. Go with the music of the Gospel sounding in your rejoicing hearts. Rise up from tents of evil pitched in the valleys of gloom and repining, and say, as you journey to the better country of the abiding worth, "Lord, it is good for us to be here."

The Case of Officer Flanagan

By OWEN KILDARE

NO centre all one's ideas and actions in the singleness of one purpose, often produces a mental condition resembling monomania. We have so many proofs of this theory that any additional instances would seem superfluous. Still, I cannot refrain from telling you the following story, because it promised so little and ended so unexpectedly. Besides, it is true, and is still lived by its principal actors.

No family among the humble folk in the Sixth Ward, enjoyed greater popularity than the Streppers. It was a standing joke in the neighborhood that, eventually, no man Strepper would be the father-in-law to most of the young men in the ward. No jest ever perpetrated had a greater chance of becoming a probability. The Streppers were blessed with a family of six children, and they were all girls.

There were some who pitied old Strepper for being provided with such an abundance of femininity, but he took it very philosophically.

"Ach, what's the difference," he would say. "They don't eat half as much as the boys, and when they get married soon, and then the husband has to buy them the dresses and all the other folderols."

At the intervals in the ages of the girls were marvels of exactness, and between Lena the oldest, and Lizzie the youngest, was a difference of just six years.

What to do with the girls and how to bring them up, never seemed a difficult problem to Mrs. Strepper. As soon as age permitted, they had to go to whatever "schooling" the public schools of the neighborhood afforded. "Fellows, nowadays, don't marry girls that ain't got no eddication," was the way Mrs. Strepper summed up the situation.

During their spare hours from sewing, the girls were trained in the mysteries of housekeeping, also a most important detail in the matrimonial virtues of a tenement-house girl.

To graduate from these educational courses, only age, not efficiency was required. When the limit of age was fixed by the factory laws was reached, the girls were apprenticed to some shop to learn a trade, and to contribute their mites to the defraying of the household expenses.

Making it all in all, the Streppers were quite content with their lot, and thought the future would develop as they had built it. The children grew up to be the most handsome girls in the ward, and when Lena reached her eighteenth year, there was no dearth of suitors for her hand. Lena's choice, fully sanctioned by her mother, was Cornelius Flanagan.

His young fellow had started life under a handicap and had fallen a victim to it. Old Roderick Flanagan, his father, had come to this country from the North of Ireland, and was an "Orangeman." This in itself was enough to create a prejudice against him, in a locality in which all other naturalized citizens were of opposite political and religious beliefs. To increase the feeling against him, Roderick Flanagan, by his inherited shrewdness and strong personality, succeeded in making himself a powerful factor in the politics of the ward, and could be hated but not ignored.

With the attaining of his majority, came political aspirations and ambitions to the son, and Cornelius Flanagan, lacking the personal attributes of his sire, fell to the level of the ordinary ward youth, being like property in the hands of the scheming statesmen, and foolishly building hopes on their delusive promises.

Old Flanagan was not long in realizing that his son would never be his political heir, and, after getting him into the Police Department, told him that he would have to shape his own career. The old man's ensuing death made this a stern reality, and Cornelius' aspirations shrank to the hope of being able to retain his present job, which is described in the vernacular as "mending the pavement."

All this did not prevent Officer Flanagan from seeming a very desirable matrimonial catch to the mothers of the many marriageable tenement belles.

"Ach, he's no worse than most o' them, and besides, he's got a steady job, that he can't lose without doing something terrible, and Cornelius ain't going to do nothing like that," said Mrs. Strepper, when her husband remonstrated with her, on hearing her matrimonial plans for Lena.

But, mother, whenever he's off duty, he's stuck in Duffy's, playing cards and hanging out in there; and you know what kind of a gang is round that corner."

"Now, see here, father," Mrs. Strepper replied, "if you expect Lena to marry an angel, she'll be an old maid all her life. There ain't no angels coming round this ward, and Cornelius Flanagan is as good a man as is to be found on the average. If he wouldn't make a good husband, do you think all the women would be half crazy to get him away from my Lena and catch him for their own daughters?"

Strepper did not attempt to answer this, preferring to depend on the wisdom of his better-half. And she should not be too hastily judged. To provide six girls in any social sphere with suitable husbands, is no easy task; and in a neighborhood, in which the salaries of the young men were far below the amount earned by policemen, no mother felt inclined to cheat her daughter out of a chance to marry one of these uniformed prizes.

The courtship of Lena Strepper and Cornelius Flanagan had grown from very small beginnings. The home charge of the sick-chamber and distracted family. Lena's cheerfulness upheld the spirits of the Strepper household, but she herself was destined to have a heavy burden of responsibility placed on her willing shoulders.

It came during the early morning hours of her watch by the invalid, that she found the course of her life directed into different channels. The rest of the family, tired from their unceasing vigil, were slumbering, and the whispered words of the mother were distinctly audible to Lena, whose ear was closely bent to the murmuring lips.

"Lena."

"Yes, mother."

"I guess you'll have to look out for father and the girls."

"Oh, I don't mind doing that until you get well again."

"There's no use o' talking that way, Lena. I'm going, and I guess you all know it. Don't you be jollying me now, Lena. You're the oldest, and you ought to have more sense. And there's no time for it anyway, because I think I'll never see daylight again."

"Oh, don't be talking like that, mother. It makes me cry; and, besides, the doctor ain't said so yet."

"Now, Lena, I don't want to set myself up for no better than I am, but I been going to church regular, and I think I can understand that our Father is going to call me home. And, Lena, I'm worried about what's going to become o' Pa and the children."

"Don't worry, mother, don't worry," and the girl's hand smoothed the gray hair of her mother with indescribable tenderness. "You know you can depend on me, and that I'll look out for them always."

"No you can't, Lena," said the patient, almost peevishly. "You're the oldest, and you been always a good girl, and it won't be right for you, now that you got the finest chance in the ward, to be stuck in the house all the time. No, daughter, you got to marry Flanagan and—oh, what will become o' them all when you go 'way too."

"Now, don't go on so, mother. I can marry Flanagan and look out for the house, too. We been keeping company so long that it don't make no difference whether we get married this year or a couple o' years from now, and, by then, they'll be all grown up, and, may be, married, too, and father can come to live with me and Cornelius."

"No, father would never give in to that," said the mother, sadly. "He's always been against you marrying Flanagan; and the others—why, they're only little girls, and it'll be years before they'll be anything like you."

When the mother died, Lena thought herself firmly pledged to take her place, and to be a mother to all of her sisters until they had been wisely provided for.

Although their minds were dulled with grief, the members of the Strepper family could not fail to notice the change which had come over Lena with the death of the mother. As soon as the family had returned from the humble funeral, and the five younger children had retired to rest or to nurse their sorrow, the father spoke to the new foster-mother.

"What's the matter, Lena?"

"Nothing, father. Why?"

"Oh, you been acting kind o' funny like, so quiet, and as if you got a whole lot older in the last few hours. Lena, girl, you know we're all sorry and miss our dear old mother, but it ain't right to give way like that and to forget that we got to keep on living."

"That's just what's the matter, father," answered the girl. "We got to keep on living, and I promised mother to take her place and to look after the whole of you, so that you won't miss her so much, and that you be taken care of, and the girls be provided for wisely and in time."

"Is that it?" smiled the father. "Why, Lenchen, we won't give you much trouble, and that shouldn't worry you so much. Besides, there's Annie, that's only a year younger than you, and all the others, too, they'll be grown up before you know it, and then you won't have to kill yourself working for us."

"I guess that's true, father; but I promised mother, and it is my duty," and, with that, Lena sounded the key-note of her future life.

"MR. STREPPER, I'M THROUGH WITH EVERYTHING THAT'S BAD," SAID OFFICER FLANAGAN VIGOROUSLY of the Streppers was on the beat of the young officer, and seeing the girl going to the nearby stores, and, later, to her daily work, their acquaintance had developed from merely nodding to each other, to long and earnest conversations at the door of the tenement.

Lena Strepper was a typical East Side girl. Her duties, including the work of the house and at the shop, as well as her church attendance, were performed with punctilious regularity, and even her social pleasures were enjoyed with great earnestness. Needless to say, the latter were of a very harmless nature, and never "taken in," unless accompanied by Cornelius Flanagan, who would have often preferred amusements of a more boisterous kind. However, his love for Lena was as sincere as his love could be, and he suppressed his inclinations out of deference for her.

Their courtship had reached the critical period when nothing excepting the naming of the date remains to be done, and their dream seemed very near realization—to be cruelly dispelled by a most unfortunate calamity. Mrs. Strepper fell ill and, ere long, it became evident that it was her last sickness.

Through the long days and nights she was nursed with loving care by her children, was never left alone, yet, without ceasing, she cried for Lena, the oldest. This desire to have her always by the bedside made Lena give up her work at the shop and to assume full

The Peace Movement

ALTHOUGH the daily press has given little attention to the recent Peace Conference, which met in New York, the occasion was a significant and important one, as marking the growth of the movement looking toward the formation of an International Peace League. It is a movement which deserves the support of good men and women everywhere. We hail it as an auspicious sign that in our own land the peace sentiment, no longer a plant of sickly growth, should be found spreading and thriving, and striking its roots deeply into the hearts of the people.

It cannot be denied that the time is favorable for a great Peace movement, in which the United States might fittingly take the lead. It should be neither sensational nor wholly sentimental, but practical and organically active and even aggressive. Such a movement would have for a foundation the eternal principles of justice, law and order, and the plainest teachings of the Gospel. We believe that the conviction is growing among intelligent people of all shades of religious opinion, that the wisest, and indeed the only reasonable method of adjusting the disputes of nations is by arbitration. It is surely time for the sane and sober-minded to do what lies in their power to convince the world of the folly and futility of war.

In October next, a National Peace Congress will assemble in Boston. If all the friends of peace and arbitration who may read these lines would take this matter into consideration, and unite on some practical measures in the intervening months, we believe that the Peace Congress, when it meets, would be so widely supported and so abundantly encouraged that it would be productive of a greater influence in national and international affairs than any of its predecessors. How to accomplish this end, is a question concerning which we should be pleased to have the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD freely express their views. There can be no nobler mission for any Christian than to endeavor, by any and all legitimate means, to promote the world's peace. At the World's Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem, a few weeks ago, a memorial representing the views of the readers of this journal and urging the adoption of the principle of arbitration by the nations, was unanimously adopted. That Memorial and its enthusiastic approval should operate as an incentive and an inspiration to peace-lovers everywhere, to aid a campaign which has for its object the abolition of war and its attendant horrors.

Science and Faith

FROM Los Angeles, Calif., comes the telegraphic report of the discussion in the Methodist General Conference, of the question of Biblical Criticism. It could not be expected that the subject would escape comment in any representative religious gathering. It is agitating the churches the world over, and the partisans on both sides are intensely in earnest. In this instance the members of the Conference appear to have left the discussion mainly to the Fraternal Delegates, one of whom came from Canada, and the other from the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The members, however, were not backward in manifesting their attitude. The University professors and college presidents applauded the advocates of criticism, while the main audience, consisting of preachers and lay delegates, indicated approval of the sentiments expressed by the opponents of criticism.

The proposition, as defined by the advanced speaker, scarcely did justice to his opponents. He said that no man ought to be asked to believe statements which had been disproved by Science. Stated in that form, the argument is plausible, and would command general approval; but it is only fair to inquire what statements they are that Science has disproved. There are many beliefs that we derive from Scripture which do not fall within the scientific domain. In pronouncing about them, Science may exceed its legitimate authority, and we have a right, in such cases, to hold to a faith that, in its own domain, is superior to Science. Neither has

Science said its last word. It has discovered, many a time, that it has been mistaken in some of its most positive assertions, and it is to-day contradicting theories which were in former times held by its most able leaders. No man need be worried about the conflict: "The counsel of the Lord, that shall stand."

Good News of the Orphans in India

WITH sincere thankfulness and with profound satisfaction, we present on other pages of this journal, the testimony of Dr. R. A. Hume, the eminent missionary of Ahmednagar, to the value of the work being done through the generosity of our readers, for the orphan children of India. Dr. Hume, as chairman for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Relief Committee, has had special opportunities of testing the results of the work, and his testimony, therefore, is entitled to all confidence. Every one whose contribution to the fund has helped to make these results possible, must be profoundly grateful for having had a share in so magnificent an undertaking.

For four years, over five thousand homeless and friendless children have been fed, clothed, sheltered and educated at the expense of readers of this journal. The problem which had to be solved at the close of the great famine was painful and difficult. The children whose parents were dead had been received into the missionary orphanages; but there were no means of supporting them. To abandon them would be to relegate them to the starvation from which they had been rescued, or in the case of the girls to give them up to a worse fate. On the other hand, there was the opportunity of training them in Christian principles and sending them out at maturity to permeate the heathendom of India. But how were they to be maintained? Where could the huge sum of money necessary even on the most economical basis be obtained? No less a sum than $375,000 was needed. The plan was suggested by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of finding for individual orphans in India, individual foster-parents in this country, who would adopt the children and become responsible for their support. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered to arrange the terms of adoption and to receive the contributions and transmit them to the various missionaries in India, who had charge of the children. The response was prompt and generous and the maintenance for over five thousand orphans was pledged, and now for four years the money has been sent to this office by the foster-parents in this country, and regularly, three times a year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has remitted its check for $25,000 to the Committee in Bombay, who distributed it to the missionaries. The arrangement has worked harmoniously and the parties to it here and in India have done their work faithfully.

The children have proved docile and intelligent. Many of them have written to the people in this country by whom they were being supported, to express their gratitude, and the missionaries who, by this scheme, were rescued from a painful dilemma, have sent regular reports of the progress of the children under their care. The education imparted has been industrial as well as general. The boys are being qualified to earn their own livelihood as carpenters, masons, blacksmiths, printers, weavers, etc., and the girls are trained for such of the lighter occupations as women in India can fill. Above all, they have had religious training, and it is with deep thankfulness to God that we hear how large a proportion of them have been received into the churches, and have given practical evidence of their conversion. Many of them have proved so intelligent that they will become teachers, and preachers, and Bible women, thus multiplying a hundred fold, by bringing other souls to Christ, the good seed sown in their own hearts.

History presents no parallel for a work so beneficent, and so hopeful as this. It is a glorious achievement, the memory of which will never be effaced. It has involved sacrifices in many an American home, the inmates of which have denied themselves luxuries, that the little orphan waif in India might be provided for. It has entailed on the missionaries a great responsibility and increased toil. It has involved for this journal considerable labor and expense. But what a magnificent result has been achieved! At the end of another year, five thousand orphans saved from death, educated, and most of them loyal servants of Christ, will go forth to be witness among their own people, to the power of the Christian faith, to which they owe their lives and the eternal hope.

That the good work already done will go on to completion, we have no doubt. Those who have so nobly done their part during the past four years, will not fail to continue their service to the end of the fifth year, and we sincerely hope that the places of some who have gone to their reward, will be filled by others, who will for a share in the glory of so delightful and Christlike an undertaking. "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water, only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward."

The Turning-point of Stanley's Life

IN the death of Sir Henry Morton Stanley, the world loses a notable figure. Long will the story of his daring, and until then unexampled exploration of Central Africa in search of Livingstone, be remembered, and the picturesque romance of that journey, no less than the valuable geographical discoveries that resulted will ever remain one of the most stirring chapters in African history. It was to Stanley's labors, then afterward, that the opening up of the "Dark Continent" to civilization was largely due. His discoveries in the interior gave the first impetus to the movement which has resulted in the widely extended development of "spheres of influence," and in this sense he was an unconscious empire builder.

There is little doubt that Stanley's experiences in the heart of the then little known continent, and especially his relations with Livingstone and his appreciation of the famous missionary's work, were the means of effecting a transformation in his own character. That which he at first undertook as a journalistic adventure later became a passion; and after he had begun to understand the spirit and mission of Livingstone, himself became imbued with a burning desire to accomplish something for the enlightenment of the heathen races. He doubtless had a vision of the time when those dusky millions, who had no knowledge of the world beyond, might be civilized and enlightened. His subsequent explorations and his writings show that while he might not have been able to enter fully in the plans and purposes of the great missionary, he had still caught something of the spiritual zeal and fire that animated Livingstone.

There have been men more distinguished in discovery and science than Henry Morton Stanley, but probably no journey of modern times gave to the world a deeper thrill than when this almost unknown writer, bearing aloft the American flag, plunged into the Central African wilderness on his mission of benevolence, and after long and perilous struggle, emerged in safety on the other side, having accomplished the object of his undertaking. It was a great deed—the deed of a strong, capable, self-reliant, courageous man. He made no conquests, annexed no territories, took no spoils; but he won the respect and confidence of the tribesmen, who in their rude and simple way, admired the splendid daring of the white traveler.

More than a quarter of a century has passed since then—years that brought to Stanley ever increasing recognition and honors. But successful authorship, wealth, title, Parliamentary career, all sink into insignificance in contrast with that memorable moment when, in a little clearing in the tropical mid-African forest, he stepped forward and clasped the hand of the well-beloved missionary, David Livingstone, the Gospel pioneer to the heathen races. That hand-clasp made Stanley famous, and his meeting with Livingstone gave to his whole life a new and grander amplitude, which remained with him until the close.

Stanley Dead

ALL the civilized world paid a tribute of respect to the famous explorer, Sir Henry M. Stanley, who died on May 10. His illness had been brief, though for some months his health had not been robust. The fever he had repeatedly suffered from in his African journeys had undermined his constitution, and though he made a strong fight against it, he was clearly an invalid. About ten days before his death, he caught cold during a drive, and on the following day pleurisy and pneumonia developed. Then there was no hope, and in spite of the most skilful medical attention and the most careful nursing, the end could not be delayed.

Stanley was in his sixty-fourth year when he died. His life began in Wales amid scenes of extreme poverty. So destitute was he, that some part of his boyhood was passed in the local poorhouse. He was then owned as John Rowlands. The love of movement and adventure, which continued all his life, brought him at the age of sixteen to America, on board a ship where he served as a cabin boy. He found employment with a merchant of New Orleans, named Henry Morton Stanley, who conceived a strong liking for the lad. It was understood that he adopted him, and the future explorer took the name of his patron. But the merchant died without making a will, and the boy was thrown on his own resources. He remained in New Orleans until the outbreak of the war, when he entered the Confederate service. Being taken prisoner, he volunteered for the northern navy, in which service he won distinction.

After the war, Stanley went to Asia Minor, writing letters to the newspapers descriptive of scenes in that land. His vivid word-painting attracted the notice of Mr. James Gordon Bennett, who succeeded in attaching him to the staff of the New York Herald. He accompanied the Abyssinian expedition as the correspondent of that journal, and was afterwards sent to Spain to report the rebellion there. Thence he was summoned to undertake the mission which won him world-wide fame.

Dr. Livingstone, the great missionary explorer, had not been heard from for more than a year. He was away on one of his long journeys. It was feared that he was dead, and it was known that if he was alive he must be in extreme poverty, as his resources had not been sufficient for so long a period. Mr. Bennett commissioned Stanley to find him, and on Jan. 6, 1871, Stanley landed on the east coast of Africa to begin his quest. It was a long and tedious journey, and was attended with terrible hardship and peril.

It was 236 days after setting out, that he reached Ujiji. To his intense delight he found Livingstone there. He was so delighted by his success, that all he could say was: "Dr. Livingstone, I presume," as if he had just met him on an American street. Livingstone and he became good friends. Stanley tried to persuade him to accompany him home, but Livingstone would not return, until he had accomplished the purpose for which he had set out. The two men remained together four months and then Stanley set out homeward, and Livingstone resumed the journey from which he never returned.

In 1874 Stanley was again sent to Africa, to take up the work of exploration which Livingstone began. His visit to Uganda, his journey up the Congo, and his adventures in Western Africa, astonished the world. On his return, he published so vivid an account of those regions, that the King of the Belgians commissioned him to return and found the Congo state. Several years were spent in that work, and on coming back to civilization, high honors were showered upon him. But even then, his work in Africa was not done. He was engaged in 1887 to go to the rescue of Emin Pasha, Governor of Equatorial Africa, who was reported to be in dire straits. This mission Stanley successfully accomplished. In 1890 he returned to England, naturalized himself, was elected to Parliament, and remained there until his death. It was a life crowded with work and extraordinary labor and marvelous achievement. It was the practical embodiment of the motto which, as Stanley himself wrote to a friend in this country, he had made his own:

Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might (Eccles. 9: 10).

More Fighting in Thibet

One of the disadvantages of the policy of seclusion pursued by the rulers of Thibet will be severely felt in attacked the British garrison at Gyantse, on May 5, about midnight, and a fierce battle ensued, in which the Thibetans were repulsed. On May 10 the attack was renewed, and since that time a fort has been erected, from which the British camp is bombarded with antiquated guns. In view of these attacks, the British Government has announced that the expedition must go on to Lhasa, to restore the prestige of the flag. The pledge is made, however, that there shall be no attempt to annex Thibet to British dominions, and that if the Llama signs the treaty of commerce, already negotiated, the expedition will withdraw. It is a pity that this sacrifice of life was not avoided, as well as further sacrifices, which must ensue. By his action, the Llama has prevented the very step which he had every reason to desire. The wise king's advice would have saved him from his blunder.

Go not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof (Prov. 25: 8).

A Vanishing Coast

Testimony recently taken in New Orleans for the United States Supreme Court, revealed remarkable changes in the coast line of that section. The question at issue is the coast line of Louisiana in 1812, because this fixes the water boundary of the State and determines whether the oyster reefs off the coast, valued at $10,000,000, belong to Louisiana or Mississippi. The old maps declare in favor of Louisiana. The contention of Mississippi is that these maps are incorrect, and the country in dispute has always been the mixture of marsh, mud and water it is to-day. As the country was uninhabited and deemed valueless, the cartographers did not think it worth while to make a fruitless and expensive survey of the marsh, and give a number of petty details in which no one was interested. Therefore they made the entire section in dispute dry land in their maps. A great deal of testimony was heard from fishermen, yachtsmen and others, who had visited the country at different times in the last twenty-five years. They told of marvelous changes, some of them coming in a single night, of islands that had appeared and disappeared, land that was a point one day and a bayou or bay the following day. One of the witnesses gave a list of islands which were in existence twenty-five years ago, but of which there was now no trace. Huge sections of the coast, formerly well wooded, had also disappeared. It was fair to assume, therefore, that if so many changes had occurred in a quarter of a century, others still more numerous had been made since 1812 of which there was no record.

Evidently a coast line undergoing such constant change affords no basis for a settlement of boundary lines. It would appear from recent theological debates, that there is a similar doubt about the line of demarkation between the church and the world. The world has been making such depredations on the church as the sea has made on the coast. We may be sure, however, that though man may be in doubt, there will be no final uncertainty.

The Lord knoweth them that are his (II. Timothy 2: 19).

BRIEF NOTES

The Salvation Army in Japan has 38 corps (stations) and outposts, 90 officers and cadets (all but 13 of whom are Japanese), a home for discharged prisoners with 40 inmates, and a rescue home for women.

The next Pan-Presbyterian Council meets in Liverpool, June 28-July 6. Dr. John Watson is to preach the opening sermon. Principal Caven, of Knox College, Toronto, will preside. America sends 100 delegates.

Arrangements are being made by the American Bible Society to issue the Revised Version of the Bible. Hitherto, a clause in the Society's charter, limits its issues specifically to copies of the Authorized or King James' version. It will be necessary, therefore, to obtain a legal amendment of the charter, but no opposition to the application is anticipated. It is proposed to secure the right to publish either the English Revision, or that of the American Committee.

The latest computation of the numbers of persons giving adherence to the different faiths of the world is presented by a German, who estimates that 550,000,000 are Christians, 202,000,000 are Mohammedans, and 11,000,000 are Jews.

FOUR YEARS OF WONDERFUL WORK
BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS

SOME OF THE CHILDREN SUPPORTED AT RAHURI, INDIA, BY "CHRISTIAN HERALD" READERS

EVERY reader of this journal who has taken part in the work of supporting, clothing and educating the poor little children who were orphaned by the great famine of 1900, will be profoundly gratified by the report which Dr. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, gave of the results, a few days ago, when he visited this office. Dr. Hume was chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Relief Committee for some time during the prevalence of the famine, and has consequently been brought in touch with missionaries all over India, who have had charge of the orphans since the famine. He is now at home on furlough, which he sorely needed after his exhausting labors.

When asked what he thought would be the general result of the vast undertaking of supporting the five thousand children, which has been carried on for four years through the medium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by its readers, he said: "I am absolutely sure that the work is the most unique, the most Christlike, the most hopeful phase of Christian missionary effort in modern times. I believe that the large majority of these children are to be the finest product of the rising generation of native Christians. Physically, though they started under serious disadvantages, they have had better care than the average Indian child, and are consequently stronger and more uniformly developed than other native children. Their intellectual development is also superior, because they have been regularly in school, and have not been kept away, as the native child in India often is for long intervals. The result has been that at Ahmednagar, in our own schools and in other cities, the children have passed through five standards in three years, instead of the usual rate of three standards in five years. In character and morals, also, they are far ahead of the average status. They have had exceptional oversight, and have been trained in good habits, in early rising, in attention to regular duties, and, above all, in the principles of Christian life, so as to recognize their obligations to one another and to the community. Industrially, too, they will prove the value of the training they have received. Their skill and intelligence developed in the industries which the missionaries have had them taught, will make them examples to their brethren wherever they may go. A remarkable testimony to these facts was given recently by Sir M. Bhownuggree, a Parsee member of Parliament, who, after inspecting the children in a missionary institution, said, "You American missionaries are doing more for the people of India than is the British Government."

Dr. Hume has evidently high hopes of future result of still greater moment. "Not only," he says, "must the advantage to these children whom we have had in training be considered, but the value of their example to the rest of the Indian community, the effect of which will be seen in after years." More than all, however, is the fact, for which there is abundant reason to praise God, that large numbers of the older orphans have become sincere Christians. In the Ahmednagar Institution, of which he has charge, Dr. Hume says, of one hundred and eighty children gathered from the famine nearly one hundred have given evidence of genuine conversion, and of these not a single one has proved unsatisfactory. Similar testimony is given by other missionaries. What is the value of a soul? What will be the effect of these native boys and girls when grown to manhood and womanhood going out into the cities and villages of India? Their salvation and the salvation of those who will be won through them, is due under God to the self-denying men and women among the readers of this journal who, by their gifts, made it possible for them to be trained under Christian missionaries in the orphanages of India.

These children, now happy, hopeful and intelligent, were, only four years ago, miserable little orphans, on the verge of starvation, homeless and friendless. Many of them would undoubtedly have perished from hunger, had not the kind-hearted missionaries taken them into their stations and given them food and shelter. Then the question arose of their future. The missionaries had no funds available for supporting them. The providence of God had bought the lambs for them to feed; but the missionaries could see no way of providing for them. Pitiful were the appeals for help that came to this office, from missionaries who sank from the necessity, which seemed unavoidable, of turning the children out of their refuges. The difficulty was laid before the readers of this journal, and the suggestion was made that individuals, or Sunday Schools, or Young People's Societies, should adopt one of these orphans and undertake its support.

Communication was opened with the missionaries, who reported that they could feed, clothe and educate a child for fifteen dollars a year. The fact was made known and God commended it to the hearts of the generous readers of this journal. Before the year 1900 closed, the support of over five thousand orphans was pledged by individuals and societies all over this land. The foster-parents could choose a boy or a girl, and could select the denomination of the orphanage in which the child should be placed. They were informed of the name and age of the child and the name and address of the missionary who had charge of it, and from time to time during the past four years they have received from the missionary reports of the child's health and progress. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD undertook the work of collecting and forwarding the money, and Dr. Klopsch has sent to India every four months a check for $25,000 for the support of the five thousand orphans. Besides this, a supplementary check has been sent regularly, to cover the expenses of the orphans in excess of the five thousand originally selected. These payments, now already exceeding the sum of $300,000, have enabled the missionaries to proceed with their work in confidence, assured that there would be no delay or uncertainty in the provision for the vast family depending on them.

The plan has worked excellently. As was inevitable, however, death and other causes have involved the dropping out of some subscribers to the fund. But in no case has the support of a child been allowed to lapse through the death or disability of its foster-parents in this country. There are now many opportunities for persons who have had no part in the work hitherto, to share in it from this time forward, by undertaking the cost of completing the education of a child who is now in need of foster-parents. The privilege of participating in a work already so fruitful in results and so bright with hope, is one that should be gladly accepted. As Christ said: "They cannot recompense you, but ye shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."

PILATE SAID, WHAT IS THE TRUTH

Christ's Trial Before Pilate

Sunday School Lesson By DR. and MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

ALTHOUGH Christ was not tried and sentenced in a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin, there can be no question that his condemnation and death were the work of the whole body of Sanhedrists—"all the council" in the sense of expressing what was the judgment and purpose of the Supreme Council of Israel, from whose judgment Nicodemus and Joseph only are known to have dissented on the way from the high priest's palace to the Prætorium, the palace of the Roman Governor. The Jewish people remained outside that they might not be "defiled," and so be shut out of the Passover feast. Pilate comes out to receive them and questions the Jewish authorities: "What accusation bring ye against this man?" In their answer they seek to avoid stating the charge of blasphemy for which they had condemned him, because they knew it could have no weight with Pilate, who had no sympathy with their religion. They answer: "If this man were not an evil doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee." Pilate casts their prisoner back upon them, saying, "Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law." But the Jews answer Pilate, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." Then they consult together, and trump up three charges: 1. That Jesus was a seditious person, stirring up the people against the Roman government; 2. That he had refused to pay tribute to Cæsar (He had actually worked a miracle in order to pay his dues, Matt. 17: 24-27); 3. That he was a conspirator, claiming to be a king. As a Roman governor, Pilate must consider these charges, for they implied treason against the Roman Government.

Illustration and Application

Whenever possible, a lesson or a sermon should be approached through some matter of great current interest. Such an approach to this lesson is afforded by Andrew Carnegie's new fund of five million dollars, to reward heroes in civil life—life-savers chiefly, such as the fireman, who risks his life to save another life from the flames; the engineer, who refuses to jump when he could save himself, if by holding fast the throttle he can save his trainload of people; the policeman, who stops a runaway, at his own great peril; the swimmer, often a woman, who, at some beach, rescues a drowning man in the face of death. When the fearlessness of the Japanese tempts us to the common error of forgetting all but military courage, Mr. Carnegie's gift puts timely emphasis on the truth that peace hath her victories, not less renowned than war. In this lesson, we behold the bravest, the greatest of life-savers, side by side with the most famous of cowards, who missed the chance to save the noblest life, by his selfish anxiety to save himself.

See the folly and sin of fear and cowardice in Herod and Pilate. The Herod of this lesson is the son of that King Herod, who sought to kill Jesus at Bethlehem, and he is the same Herod who showed himself a fivefold coward in connection with the death of John the Baptist, acting in that case very much as Pilate did in this. Herod was, first of all, afraid of his wife; his bad wife Herodias, who had been wickedly divorced from his brother to marry him. Pilate also was afraid because of his wife; his good wife, whose dream led her to send word to her husband: "Have thou nothing to do with that righteous man." Herod was, secondly, afraid of the multitude; but it was because they were friends of John the Baptist and believed he was a prophet; while Pilate feared the multitude, because they had been cajoled by the Pharisees into hostility to Jesus. Herod, thirdly, feared John, as Pilate did Jesus, because of his manifest goodness. Herod, fourthly, feared the guests at his drunken feast, and so was prevented from breaking the bad promise he had given to the dancing girl, who had on that promise asked the murder of John. Pilate's fourth fear was not of guests, nor did he have the poor excuses of drunkenness and a bad promise, but it was a fear that he might be accused to the Emperor and lose his office. It was the oft-told tale of doing the mean thing for the sake of an office—for the sake of winning or holding it. Herod's fifth fear was of a ghost. After he had murdered John, when he heard of Jesus doing a like work, he ran among his servants in terror, exclaiming: "It is John the Baptist, whom I beheaded, he is risen from the dead." In like remorse, Pilate, who had as vainly as Macbeth tried to wash the stain of Christ's death from his hands, is reputed to have died miserably, after losing the office he sacrificed everything to keep, by suicide on Mount Pilatus.

What folly to live in such a succession of fears. And how plainly it is all the fruit of selfishness. How much happier, even, on the march to death, were John the Baptist and Jesus. Their fearlessness manifestly came from faith, that cries as it looks up to God: "How can we fear anything with him looking at us!" Jesus was about to lose not only life, but good name, dying in the most shameful way. But he was more pitiful of Pilate than of himself. The scene, it has been well said, was "Pilate before Christ." Pilate acted as if he were the real prisoner, Christ as if he were already Judge and King. He who beholds the face of God will never fear the face of man. If you are troubled with fears, the remedy is in an increase of faith, that is, a clearer vision of God. "Be not afraid, only believe."

"I HAVE SUFFERED MANY THINGS THIS DAY IN A DREAM BECAUSE OF HIM"

Let us now, in a succession of real pictures, find the real Pilates of our own time, who "crucify the Lord afresh" by cowardice. If some of these pictures mirror ourselves, let us turn to the fearless Christ, praying that we, too, like John the Baptist, beholding as in a mirror, the courage of our Lord, may be changed into the same image, so that like the other John, we may, by our boldness, prove we have been with Jesus.

A dozen boys on the playground are tormenting one of their playmates, calling him "sissy" because he will not smoke cigarettes with them, as if it were manly to do what short of the heathen wife of Pilate, and is more like cowardly Pilate himself.

Here is a young man who in a boarding-house has Christ's name dishonored by curses and sneers, and cowardly silence gives consent. Here is a young woman who welcomes young men of blemished reputations to parties, because to leave them out, especially if they are not popular, may make her unpopular. Here is a Christian man, who a member of the Board of Trade, makes no protest when some wine-bibber proposes that the greatest enemy of commerce, the intoxicating cup, shall be given a place at an annual banquet. He pretends to himself that his cowardly silence is "consideration for the rights of others." Here a woman whose conscience condemns wine, and who wears the white ribbon, but she discards the badge, and goes to wine dinners, and even serves it at her own table, because she fears the sneers and the ostracism of the social set in which she desires to move. These belong to the tribe of Pilate, and by these cowards the brave, unselfish Christ is "crucified afresh."

On the other hand, let heroic life-savers inspire us to heroic soul-saving. Let us be brave to save a soul, as so many are who have no chance to save an imperilled body.

Only a few weeks ago the white people of Columbus, Georgia, erected a monument made of Georgia and Vermont marble to a black hero, containing this inscription: "Erected by the city of Columbus, to mark the last resting place of Bragg Smith, who died on December 30, 1903, in the heroic and fruitless effort to rescue the city engineer from a caving excavation on Eleventh Street."

"Honor and fame from no condition rise; Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

With this, let us place another Southern stance, a monument to quiet, everyday courage, that persists in little acts of kindness until this persistency, overcoming difficulties and discouragements, grows to a coral island of courage.

In a large, open square in New Orleans stands a beautiful marble statue erected by the city, and on the statue are these words: "The Statue of Margaret of New Orleans. She was left an orphan by the ravages of yellow fever. She married in early manhood but her husband soon died, and she was left with a young child. She was poor and uneducated, and could scarcely write her name. She went to work in the Orphan Asylum for Girls. She toiled early and late, solicited charities from merchants, and, indeed, put her whole life in the work for the orphans. When a new and beautiful asylum was built, Margaret and one of the Sisters of Mercy freed from debt. Margaret opened a dairy and bakery in the city of her own. Everybody knew her, and patronized her mill wagon and bakery. She worked very hard and saved enough to help the orphans, whom in effect she had adopted her own children. She never owned a silk dress or wore a kid glove, and she was very plain, but the city erected this beautiful monument to the orphans' friend as a thank-offering for a beautiful, helpful, unselfish life of service. It was also a life of courage, the courage of one great act, the courage of daily overcoming discouragement."

Pilate was really guilty of double treason: to Rome, in failing to discharge and defend the prisoner, he had acquiesced; and to Christ, his own rightful King, whom he crucified when he should rather have crowned and worshiped him. And every one who rejects Christ is a sharer in this double treason of Pilate.

Dr. Torrey tells this story: "One day, in Maryborough, in Australia, a fine-looking man came to see me. He said, 'I want to talk with you, I don't know much about your preaching. Now, I am a moral man, and no one can deny it. Now, I would like you to tell me what you have against me.' I said, 'Are you a Christian?' 'No, sir,' he replied. 'Have you taken Jesus Christ as your personal Saviour, and surrendered your life to him as your Lord and Master, and confessed him as such before the world, and given your life to him?' 'No, sir,' he replied. 'Then, I say, I charge you, sir, with high treason against your King. Jesus Christ is your King; God made him so, and I charge you, sir, with high treason against your King. And a dark cloud came over the man's face as he said, 'Good afternoon,' and walked away. Months passed away, I was preaching in Ballarat, about forty miles from Maryborough. After the service a man came to me and said, 'Do you remember me?' I said, 'I have seen you somewhere but I cannot place you.' He said, 'Do you remember ever charging a man with high treason?' Then he told me his story, and I remembered him. He said, 'I am the man and I have come to Ballarat, sir, to tell you that you have never charged me with high treason again.' We dropped our knees, and he said, 'Lord Jesus, I hand in my allegiance. I give up my treason, I take thee as my King.'

"PILATE SAITH UNTO THEM, BEHOLD THE MAN"

weakens both body and brain. One boy looking on realizes the meanness of this persecution, but he fears that if he protests the gang will turn on him with jibes or worse, and so he tries to be neutral, and only succeeds in being a coward.

Here is a group of girls. They are saying hateful and mean things about another girl who is absent, and whom they dislike, because she is more studious and obedient, and so is more liked by the teacher. One of the group does not join in this gossip and scandal, and does not like it, but she keeps still, lest she draw the dislike of the others upon herself by a brave protest against their injustice. She falls

MOLLY JENNER'S WAY

By Margaret E. Sangster

YOU have nothing to say to me, Mary?"

"I have nothing to say."

"You know you are unfair, dear. I put the money where I thought it would be safe. I thought that stock for Susan. Who had any fear about Midvale Bank ten days ago? You act as if I'd planned to lose the money, as if you thought me a thief, as if, and help me, Mary, after livin' with me 'most thirty years, you hated the sight of me."

The wife's face was set like a mask. Her large eyes looked at Ephraim Jenner, as if they did not see him. Her lips were tightly shut. In her view Ephraim had committed the unpardonable sin. He had been a large stockholder in the Midvale Bank, investing there the savings of many toiling years, and now the bank had been hopelessly wrecked by a dishonest cashier. Word had come to the farm so suddenly that it had stunned both husband and wife, but the man regained his courage first, while the woman was wrapped in a tongue of despair. She had not addressed a word to her husband of her own free will since the news came. She moved about the house like a woman under a spell. The atmosphere around her seemed freezing, though the weather was hot and dry, the earth hard-caked by drought, the grass burned to a crisp, and the stubble brown and brittle under the feet.

"Aren't you going to see Susan graduate, mother?" asked Ephraim, speaking again after a pause, in which the silence was so emphatic that the clock ticking in the corner of the living room sounded in his ears as if every vibration had the snap of a whip. "You'll surely won't you?"

No answer.

"Mary Jenner," the man persevered, a red deepening in his sunburnt cheek, "you've got to answer me. Are you, or are you not, goin' on the train this noon to Waterford so as to be at Susan's Commencement to-morrow. The child will be looking for you, Mary."

"I can't help it. I've no heart to go."

"You ought to go, for Susy's sake."

"I won't go, Ephraim."

"Susy'll be hurt."

"She'll be worse hurt when she comes home and finds we're packing up for the farmhouse, when she finds what fools we've been, all our eggs in one basket. Don't talk to me, Ephraim," and the pent-up passion now poured itself forth in a rush. "Don't talk to me! S'pose I'll go to Waterford College and make a show of myself, now that I can't ever hold my head up among the neighbors, now that the farm'll have to be mortgaged. I wish I was dead, that's all!"

"Others are almost as badly off, Mary."

"That doesn't help us."

Her pale face settled back into iron lines. Her husband sighed, and the sigh was almost a groan. A sanguine, easy-tempered, happy-hearted man, he could not understand his wife in this mood. Suddenly he had comprehended that she had lost money, that the pride of her life was in getting on, and having plenty to give to Susy, in some far-off future, when she should be done with working and living. Susy had been finely educated. Her mother had kept Susy's hands white and soft, though her own were hard. Four weeks ago, Susy's graduating gown, with ruffles and frills, and tucks and puffs, a filmy muslin with pipings of satin and flutings of ribbon and a broad sash, had been sent to Waterford by express. What pleasure the mother had taken in that gown. She had been lavish beyond reason. It had expressed a mother's pride and gratitude, a mother's vanity. She had written to Susy that she must be photographed in that dress.

"It couldn't be prettier if Susy were goin' to be married," she had said to herself, gloating over the delicate costume with a complacency odd in so self-conceited a woman. "I don't believe the governor's daughter'll look any finer than my Susan," she said, as she wrapped it in the tissue paper and tied up the box. With a throe, the habit of economy had asserted itself when the box was fairly gone. But the expense of Susan's brave apparel could be met by extra plainness herself for the next six months, and Ephraim could manage with his old suit another year. Susan would be needing pretty things straight along of course.

Nobody ever looked twice, the mother argued, at old people like Ephraim Jenner and herself; but Susan, nineteen and a beauty, what could be denied Susan!

All this had happened and been settled before the crash came. It was ancient history. Mrs. Jenner felt as if she had lived a hundred miserable years since the bank failed. Ephraim had said she seemed to hate him. In the depths of her angry, aching, unreasonable soul, she did, for the time, hate him. She owned it to herself savagely, a contemptuous sneer behind the words. For conscience was not dead, and she knew that Ephraim was not to blame. Midvale Bank had seemed to them both a sort of Gibraltar. But she was railing at fate, at her husband, and at God.

Ephraim had gone out, closing the door gently. His wife did not glance after him, nor make the slightest effort to clear away the breakfast table, nor put the house in order. Crumbs, unswept, had been lying on the carpet for days. A hen strayed in from the yard, a thing unprecedented in Mrs. Jenner's housekeeping, finding its way through the door opposite the one by which Ephraim had left the room. The hen loitered about, picking up crumbs. Mrs. Jenner did not notice. She rocked to and fro, her eyes on her lap. An hour passed. The hen strolled out again into the sunshine. Mrs. Jenner still sat in idleness, rocking aimlessly.

Her husband came back. Heavily but hurriedly he crossed the kitchen to their chamber, which was on the same floor. Presently he stepped out in his shirt-sleeves, and went to the boiler on the big stove for a dipper full of warm water. He shaved and put on his Sunday suit. The hired man, who lived down the road a piece and came by the day, had harnessed old Ned. Ephraim called him, and gave him some directions. Then he came into the room.

"Mary, I'm goin' to Waterford to see Susy graduate. Won't you come with me? Think how disappointed she'll be, if neither of us is there. Her great day, too. Mark Trevor's going by the noon train. He stopped at the gate a while ago, and told me he'd ordered flowers for Susy. I told him to order some for you. I gave Mark the money to pay for them, Mary. You'd be sorry when you thought it over, if Susan's Commencement was not as nice as any of the other girls. Mark's broke ground for his new house, Mary. We'll not have Susy so very long."

"Ephraim, you're trying to coax me. But I won't be coaxed. It was just like you to spend money on such foolishness when we're ruined. We may want it for bread yet."

"Will you drive with me to the depot, Mary?"

"John Hubbell can drive with you."

"John's got the other work waiting. I want you. Come along, and bring Ned home again."

It was his little ruse to persuade her into the air. She saw through it and went just a bit too far.

"I'll oblige you," she said; "but don't talk to me on the road. I have no patience with such a fool."

She put on her sunbonnet. Ephraim helped her into the buggy but did not speak. He kept his eyes fixed on the horse, and on the long dusty road, baked yellow in the blazing heat. The match had touched the fuse at last. He was resentful now, but it was not his way to explode. Mary saw a gray set jaw, a stern expression, strange on that usually gentle face, and she noted the strength of the hard, gnarled old hands that held the reins. She looked at him, her own mood softening. When blue eyes kindle they smolder. She knew that Ephraim's eyes in his rare anger were like coals, and though she thought herself as wrathful as ever, she was afraid, her wrath was as the crackling of thorns under a pot to the depth of his, once started. The slow to anger are harder to be won than a beleaguered city.

At the station, Ephraim stepped down and handed her the reins.

"Drive straight home," he said, briefly. "There's goin' to be a shower."

Country custom did not require a husband to raise his hat when taking leave of a wife, but Ephraim had never before gone for a night without saying, "Good-by, dear. Take care of yourself," without a tender look. This was the first unhappy parting in thirty years.

Ephraim tramped heavily into the station, and bought his ticket. Originally he had not intended to go to Waterford, though his affection for his only child was as pervading and assertive as her mother's. He had always adored Susy, and she was the apple of his eye. But they had all along planned it that Mary would go alone to Commencement, and that Susy would understand how hard it was for both to leave home at once in midsummer.

Mary drove back as fast as she could urge the fat and lazy horse, for the hint of a shower had become a menace. She thought she heard the rumble of the outgoing train, but it was possibly thunder, and that terrified her. She had a half-insane horror of a thunderstorm. Fast as she drove, the black clouds seemed to hurry after her. Brave in many ways, she was a coward in an electric storm, and Ephraim knew it and had not this time cared. For thirty years he had indulged her when the summer tempests fell, humored her whims and caprices about shutting windows and locking herself up in dark closets, chafing her hands when they grew cold, holding her head against his faithful breast, soothing her with soft phrases.

He would croon over her, "There! there! hush! hush! it's goin' by. You're all right." She had been thus cared for, thus sheltered a thousand times. It was one of the little things she had not known to be a great thing.

To-day, as she drove home alone, the old terror leaped on her like a panther from a thicket. It gripped her furiously. A great lump came strangling into her throat. As she turned in at her gate, and headed Ned to the barn, John, the hired man, came to take the horse. He grinned fatuously.

"Well, Mrs. Jenner, I promised Mr. Jenner I'd look after things, but I never thought he'd leave you, with a cyclone may be comin' up. Better hurry in! It's goin' to be a big blow this time, sure!"

Blinded with tears, choking with sobs, frightened half to death, Mary Jenner threw herself on the lounge in the sitting-room, sunbonnet and cape falling on the floor. As John had said, there was a big blow. The house rocked. The trees by the garden gate bent before the gale. The worst storm of the season had arrived.

In the tumult of her abject fear, and the physical distress that bowed her as if on the rack, Mary Jenner forgot her grievance, and the spirit melted out of her utterly. What did she care for lost money? She knew she was dying!

A ball of fire ran over the dried and faded lawn, flashed into the cellar beneath her, struck up through the floor, and hurled itself out again through the window. The old clock fell with a tremendous clamor and noise. For Mary Jenner, time and the things of time ceased to be. She fainted, and lay on the lounge in merciful oblivion to all that was going on.

She came to herself, was it five minutes later, or ten years, and strong arms were about her. A voice sweet with the tender love of a lifetime, spoke familiarly. No, this was neither heaven nor the judgment day. It was Mary Jenner's kitchen.

"There, there, dearie! Hush-hush, the storm's most over. I'm here with you. You're all safe, Molly. I'm here!"

"Ephraim!" she murmured, "Ephraim!" "Just your old bear of an Ephraim, Molly. Poor girl! The storm nearly killed you, didn't it? Poor little Molly!"

She looked up. The faithful blue eyes were smiling into hers. The dear hands were smoothing her forehead. She tried to sit up, but fell back. She smiled. The storm was passing. A sunbeam slanted over the carpet.

"Lie still!" said her husband. "You lie still, dear."

"You came back, Ephraim?"

"Of course I came back. The train was late. I saw the storm was going to be worse than I thought, a regular out an' outer, so I hired Joel West to come out of his way and leave me here. He'll do anything for money, you know, Mary."

"Oh, Ephraim, don't!"

"Don't what?"

"Don't mention money! I've been getting to love it! It's just as well ours is lost, considering the day of judgment!"

Oh, Ephraim, forgive me, I've been so horrid, and—won't you kiss me?"

The wife made her plea half timidly, but the husband gathered her close to his heart, and their lips met in a kiss of perfect love and pardon. Mary had found out that money was not everything.

That evening, together, when supper was cleared away, they swept and dusted the disorderly house. Very early next day, in the freshness of the rising dawn they caught the train for Waterford.

The Governor and his wife were present, for the occasion was doubly a function for them, as their daughter received a diploma, and the Governor made an address. But Susan Jenner had the valedictory, and two prouder people than the plain-looking couple, who watched her every movement with adoring eyes, were not in the crowded building that day. A new peace had crept over Mary Jenner's face, and she looked younger than she had in years.

"Good stock, those Jenners!" said the Governor to his wife. "They've lost nearly all they have in the world in that Midvale Bank trouble, but did you see how serene they were, how dignified; you can't down Americans. I tell you, Sarah, that's a clever girl of theirs. I hope Dorothy'll keep her as a friend."

"You are such a dear, sentimental fellow," said the lady, squeezing the Governor's arm, as they were seated in the carriage, "that I'll tell you a secret. Dorothy says that Susan Jenner is engaged to Mark Trevor, the young man who's going to be your private secretary."

"A young man with a career before him! Good!" said the Governor.

Susan had anticipated some opposition from her mother. Mrs. Jenner had reckoned a good deal on having some yes of Susan's company.

"But, mother," she said, when they had their first confidential talk after she was settled at home, "you and father were just the age of Mark and me when we were married."

"Girls used to marry younger than they do now, Susy."

"You waited a good while for me, didn't you, mother?" Susy was sitting in a moonlight in her own room, looking sweet and childish.

"A good while, daughter; but they were happy years. Your father was always good."

"Yes," said Susy. "Daddy is good. Do you think, mother, there's a chance at all that he'll ever recover from the bank?"

"I don't know, Susy, and I don't worry. Notice, child, I don't worry. Ephraim and I are both spared, and I've had a awakening."

Old Strepper and the sisters, not familiar with cases of such focussed devotion, did not interfere with Lena, feeling convinced that her "fit" would pass into normality in a short time. Their expectations were wrong, for Lena, instead of abating her enthusiasm, became almost a fanatic.

She seemingly forgot the short span of time which stood between herself and her sisters, and unconsciously assuming the demeanor of an aged woman, acted the part of mother with a most astounding naturalness. To be "mothered" by their own sister was, at first, repugnant to the other children. Then they made her the target of ridicule.

The father did not take sides in this family evolution, preferring to wait for its outcome. As weeks and weeks passed by, without increasing the expense account or diminishing the fare, he thought it best to let conditions remain as they were.

Once it occurred to him to inquire what Lena did with the small balance left from her weekly allowance and not accounted for in her statement.

"What you been doing with that eighty cents you made on this week's bill, Lena?"

"Why? Didn't you folks have enough to eat?"

"Oh, yes, only I thought that if you had nothing better to do than to buy some useless trash with the difference, you might as well let me have it to save it up and buy something decent."

"Well, pa, I don't think flowers is much use, but I been sending the girls over in turns on Sundays to take over the few pinks and roses that I could buy for them few pennies, so's mother's grave wouldn't look so bare."

The father was silent for quite a time.

"Say, Lenchen, that's all right and I ain't begrudging nothing for that. But why don't you go over some Sunday, or go out of an evening? You'll be sick, staying in the house, the way you do."

"I can't, father. You know I got to look after the house and the girls," and she went back to her work.

The one who suffered most from this transformation of Lena was Cornelius Flanagan. To call at the girl's house was out of the question, as the father's aversion was by no means overcome, and Lena would have never consented to see her intended in his absence and while she was alone. His only opportunities to exchange a word with her were when he was lucky enough to meet her on an errand to one of the stores. But she was no more inclined to listen to any talk about naming the day, sending Flanagan away with the vague ultimatum that she had a duty now and could not think of getting married while the children had still to depend on her.

He, too, hoped that Lena would change her mind; but a twelvemonth went around and Annie, the next in age, forsook the parental roof to get married, and Flanagan's fate was still the same. There were times when his patience became exhausted and he spoke quite bluntly.

"Now, see here, Lena. It would be all right, if your sisters really needed you. But they're all grown up, and there is enough o' them to take care of the old man. If you were to marry me now, I'd give you an allowance, and then you could hire a woman to go and take your place to do the heavy work in your father's house."

"It ain't the work so much, Cornelius, as that they ain't got no mother, and I promised to stay and do my duty to them."

"Gracious, Lena, you're talking as if you was seventy-five and the others about three or four years. I don't blame you for trying to live up to the promise you made the old lady as long as it's necessary, but that you been doing long ago, and now you owe it to me to say good-by to all that and to marry me."

It was all in vain.

"I can't help it, Cornelius, and I hope you won't be mad; but I promised mother,—"

Time never stops, and, in due course, chick after chick left the coop, until only one, Lizzie, the youngest, remained. I do not know if Lizzie turned out to be a spoiled girl. If she did not, it was not her fault, for no mother could have lavished more affection and tenderness on her than Lena did. Lena fairly worshiped and slaved for the last one of her charges.

Through it all, a term of several years, Flanagan had stood stanch and hopeful as far as his love for Lena was concerned, but had not improved thereby. His stubbornness helped him to swallow the jests, which were made at the expense of his enforced celibacy, but to put himself into better humor afterwards, he had taken more and more to drinking. All this comedy-drama was played in a very narrow compass, and it was only natural that Lena heard of the evil ways of her lover. It needed only that to fairly upset her.

At last came the day, on which also the youngest, Lizzie, was ready to follow her husband into her new home, and it was an event which produced varying effects in the hearts and minds of those interested.

Cornelius Flanagan used the occasion as an excuse to get drunk and to gain forcible entrance into the Strepper apartments, from which he was expelled by the father, who had determined to repay Lena's years of toil, by making her the sole object of his paternal love and care.

Lena had attended the wedding ceremony in the little church, but immediately after it, went home, not caring to partake of the following feast. Always quiet, her absence was not noticed until the evening had far advanced, and then it was the father who inquired for her.

"Oh, I guess she went home to see if there wasn't some housework to be done," sneered one, and the father, following the hint, hurried to the tenement.

He found one who had once been Lena. Crouching on the floor in her very best dress—it was neither of silk or satin—she was busily scrubbing.

"Lena, what are you doing?" cried the father, feeling himself confronted by a new condition.

A vacant stare was the only answer, then the scrubbing was again resumed.

"Come, Lena," pleaded the father, now thoroughly alarmed, "Lizzie is asking for you and wants you to come back."

She smiled and crooned.

"No, Mamie was calling me, and I told her not to cry, and to have nothing to do with a bad fellow like Eddie; and then Aggie, she wanted me to ask you to forgive her for—but say, father, they're calling me, and I can't find them—I can't find them—and mother told me, and I'm so tired, but I got to look after my chicks, because I'm an old hen; Cornelius said so, and—"

"Lenchen, my Lenchen," the father having stood like one transfixed until then, knelt beside his oldest child, and buried his weeping eyes in the tresses of her bowed head, "Look at me, Lenchen! Don't you know me? I'm your old father."

"I got to scrub the stairs yet before Lizzie comes home. She always laughed at me."

The father heard no more. The nearest physician was three blocks away, but old Strepper, forgetting his years, ran with marvelous speed.

The noise of the closing door switched Lena into a different mood. The appeals, the cries for her multiplied. It was "Lena, Lena," here and everywhere. Now, it came from the bed-room; now, from the kitchen, and now from the street. And from there it came so beseechingly that no one could refuse to hurry there to help. But in the street there was nobody to be seen and—oh, yes, now it came from the next block. When that was reached, it came still from the next block, and very soon there were no more blocks, only a wide street, with a dock and a lot of dark water at the end of it. One doesn't like to jump into the river in one's best frock, but duty is duty, and a promise is a promise, and she thought she heard some one calling "Lena, Lena." So, just one more step, and then it would be found out who was in trouble, Annie or Lizzie, or maybe even Aggie, so here—

"Lena, for heaven's sake, Lena!"

A man in a dishevelled police uniform sprang from a seat on the dock and tore the girl, who was about to jump into the darkness, back to the floor.

For a moment she seemed to get back to reason,—just long enough to recognize who had saved her. Then the wandering began again.

"Heavenly Father, you know what trouble I am in, and you will help me. I got to do my duty and keep my promise and I don't mind, but it breaks my heart to see that Cornelius don't understand, and goes and gets drunk, as if he didn't care for me at all. You know, Father, I love him, and as soon as all my chicks are married—he once called me an old hen, then I can marry him—if he will still have me. I don't think I'm good enough, anything else much, than scrubbing and cooking, but I would like so much to be happy for once—and I hope it ain't sin to wish for that. But, now, please, Heavenly Father, excuse me, but I think Lizzie is crying for me, and—"

All the rest became unintelligible, cause two strong arms encircled her, and carried her back to the street, where the father, who had tracked her to the river met them.

"I'll give you a hand carrying her back to the house, and then—I guess I'll back and do what she meant to do," said Flanagan, as they steadied themselves, help the girl up the street.

"What are you talking about?"

"Why, she knelt down there on the dock and prayed for me, did you hear me—prayed for me, and I—not even good enough to be food for fishes."

There was that about the moment which swept away all previous misund standings, and the father could feel or grateful towards the man who had saved his daughter.

"She prayed for you? Well, then you forgive me, for God would not refuse to listen to such a—"

"To such an angel as my Lena," Flanagan interrupted. "Mr. Strepper, I through with everything that's bad, and all the rest of my life I shall atone. I night I had an illustration of how what seems to have somebody die for you, a now, henceforth, I shall live as He wants me to live. And Lena will help me."

"Don't be too sure o' that, Cornelius. My poor girl is very sick, and may she'll never—"

"Oh, yes, she'll be well again, because He doesn't let such as her die, for there are a power for Him on earth."

Cornelius Flanagan was right for once. Lena was soon nursed back to health, and reason, and, at last, got married herself. The only reminder of that night is her hair, which became snowy white.

This story is true. Still, should you doubt me, I can tell you how you can prove it yourself.

If you should ever meet a policeman—I cannot disclose his present rank—at a Christian assemblage, look around the room, and if you see a bright-looking young woman with white hair, in his neighborhood, you can be reasonably sure that they are Cornelius Flanagan and his wife, or, at least, the originals of those two

JAPAN'S second army—a force of about 60,000 men, under command of Baron Oku—which landed at Pitsewo Cape Terminal, on the eastern coast of the Liao-tung peninsula, May 4-6, encountered very slight opposition. One of the first results of this new movement was cutting off of Port Arthur from rail communication northward, the Japanese pushing across the peninsula and stopping the trains south of Polandien. There were rumors of a landing at Port Arthur on the western side, but they were not confirmed. A portion of this new force was reported to have marched northward, with the purpose, it was supposed, of supporting operations in that direction by Gen. Kuroki's army, while a detachment advanced southward in the direction of Port Arthur.

Meanwhile, New Chwang was in a condition bordering on panic. Believing themselves liable to attack by an overpowering force, the Russians in New Chwang began to dismantle the fortifications, and were reported to be evacuating the place and retreating in the direction of Liao-Yang, the Russian military base.

On May 9, intelligence was received that the Russian General Staff had moved from Liao-Yang to Mukden, still further north, and might even go to Harbin, regarding their available forces as insufficient to make an effective stand against the Japanese in southern Manchuria. There were apprehensions of pillaging at New Chwang when the Russians departed, and a strong force of Chinese bandits was reported to be in readiness to loot the city. Vessels will be sent there by the other powers to preserve order.

Several reports have been received of fighting between the advance guards of Gen. Kuroki's army and the Russians who were driven from Fenwancheng last week, but no serious engagement occurred. The Japanese, instead of following in the pursuit, seem to have rested for several days, to refresh the troops. From accounts, the fighting at Kuliencheng and Hamatan on May 1 and 2 was much more serious than first reports indicated. Koki reports that his troops buried 1,500 Russian dead, and that the Russian wounded were left on the field. Russian losses were nearly 1,000 men.

Every day brings some new and conflicting version of the military situation, the result of a total lack of authentic sources of news. In a week there have been cabled reports of battles at Liao-Yang, New Chwang, and several other points, which never took place. There were also sensational stories by the cable of the blowing up of the Russian fleet at Port Arthur, the capture of Dalny, the sinking of the cruiser Rurik of the Vladivostok fleet, a land-and-sea assault on Port Arthur, and the daring trip of a train, loaded with ammunition, from Liao-Yang to the Port Arthur garrison, all of which were denied in succession. It would seem that the invading Japanese are carrying out their plans slowly and with due deliberation. That a continued attack on Port Arthur by land and sea is impending is, however, reasonably certain, and any day may bring startling news concerning the besieged fortress and its garrison of 20,000 soldiers and 10,000 sailors. Admiral Togo, on May 10, reported that a series of heavy explosions had been heard by his fleet while far out at sea, and the explanation came by the cable two days later, in the statement that the Russians had blown up the docks and piers at Dalny, presumably to render a Japanese landing at that place more difficult. A second despatch added that the whole port of Dalny had been destroyed. Russia had expended nearly $150,000,000 on the place, and the docks and piers alone were valued at $9,000,000. It was Russia's chief commercial emporium on the peninsula.

General Kouropatkin still entertains hopes of being able to check the Japanese advance and regain control of the Liao-tung Peninsula. Exclusive of the Port Arthur and New Chwang forces, he has not at present more than 150,000 men at his disposal, but expects, by July 1, to have an army sufficiently strong to warrant him in assuming the offensive. A small Russian force, chiefly Cossacks, is still in northern Korea, where it is raiding the towns and harassing the Japanese garrisons. It lately attacked the garrison at Anju, but was repulsed after a sharp fight with a loss of fifty men.

A battle is expected soon in the neighborhood of Liao-Yang. Haicheng, north of New Chwang, may also be the scene of a fight, from present indications, as a considerable Japanese force is threatening the place, which is strongly held by the Russians. Liao-Yang is in communication with Port Arthur by carrier-pigeons.

PUZZLE No. IX.

IN the register of officers and graduates at the Military Academy of West Point this record may be found: "—, —, died August 25, 1862, at Shanghai, China, aged forty-four."

As a student he was noted for scholarship and character. He served as an officer in the army, and was a military professor at West Point. Just at the time when his military prospects were brightest, he accepted what seemed to him a higher call, resigned his commission, and went to China, where he labored as a missionary for eighteen years. He rendered efficient aid to American residents in Shanghai during the Taiping rebellion.

Some one said to him: "If you were at home you would be a Major General." No doubt I might be," he replied. "Men whom I drilled are in that position—herman, Thomas, Rosecrans—but I would not exchange places with one of them. No post of influence on earth is equal to that of a man who is permitted to preach the gospel to four hundred millions of his fellow-men."

A COLONIAL DOWRY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT IS told of Samuel Sewall, that he courted Betsey Hull, In the days of simple living, when New England's frugal folk Wrested food from deep-sea billows, and though often times were dull, Toiled with heart and hand undaunted;—sturdy were those hearts of oak.

Betsey was a pretty maiden, like a primrose, sweet and fair, And her suitor, strong and stalwart, came of good and honest stock; She had bloomed in radiant beauty, in the chill New England air, He was of New England granite;—fit to stand on Plymouth Rock.

On the day that they were wedded, Betsey's father called them in To the warehouse where his fortune safe was under lock and key. Boxes packed with pine-tree shillings; you and I could scarce begin Count of all that shining silver, like the sand beside the sea.

"Daughter Betsey," said the old man, "step into that scale of mine;" Goodly weight had daughter Betsey, plump and rounded, laughing there; In the other scale by handsfull, heaped the father, shillings fine, Till the even balance showed him measure honest to a hair.

"Take her dowry, Samuel Sewall," said the smiling merchant-man, "'Tis n't every bride who carries weight of silver to her lord;" Smooth and happy through the years, onward thence their story ran, Love and virtue to them bringing, evermore a rich reward.

Little ones were sent to bless them, and though little graves were made In the churchyard on the hilltop, they had bliss as well as dole; Rang the roof with shout and laughter, as the merry children played, And the psalm and prayer went skyward from the parent's reverent soul.

When at last to Betsey Sewall came the angel from above, Bidding her to cross the river, there was weeping and lament; And the lonely widowed husband, after all those years of love, Desolate and uncompanioned, could not long abide content.

But no other mate to Samuel brought the joy that Betsey Hull, Worth her weight in shining silver, poured upon his faithful heart. And his life with her was brimming, of deep gladness it was full, Until Death, the dark-browed angel, came those happy ones to part.

Extraordinary Bargains in Books

IN common with other large publishing houses, we have accumulated in our shipping department remnants of book-lots, which we must now sacrifice, in order to make room for new consignments. This is an exceptional opportunity for bargain-hunters, and is open only to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In view of the small number of volumes which are here offered, we must request our correspondents to enclose with the price asked, a two-cent stamp for the return of the money, in case the order comes too late. WE PREPAY ALL CHARGES

Questions and Answers

respondents are asked to remember that cannot examine poetry for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and that we cannot run such MSS. when unsolicited.

Edward B. Texarkana. 1. Is there such a creature as the sea-serpent? 2. What is the largest known sea-monster extant?

Aquatic monsters that have been so designed, may exist, but we have no present proof of the fact. There are many seemingly attested cases of their appearance, however, and naturalists have come to the conclusion that, after allowing for involuntary exaggeration of eye-witnesses, the phenomenon of the sea-serpent, so-called, might be very likely were produced by manatees, rays, giant squid, basking sharks or stags of porpoises. 2. There is said to be in Arctic waters, a great fish known as "the flounder," larger and more powerful and active, though probably no heavier than the whale, of which he is the inveterate foe. He hunts the whale, and beats it with a great fin or tail. Fishermen in Alaskan waters tell thrilling stories of this big fish, of which naturalists seem to know nothing.

Is there any way of helping children who have inherited sensitive dispositions, to overcome them, and what would you advise?

Over-sensitiveness is often caused by self-consciousness, or too much thought of self. A child can be shown that it will be happier in thinking of others, and thus taught the lesson of forgetfulness of self in its attempt to make others happy, it will be of great assistance in overcoming this unhappy disposition. Persons who are extremely sensitive, are not only often unnecessarily unhappy themselves, but they are apt to add very little to the joy of others. Teach the children to think more of other's feelings, and less of their own.

Pl. Ontario, Ind. 1. Do they have a saloon in the White House? 2. Is it right for a minister of the Gospel to have a billiard table in his house? 3. How old was Solomon when he died? 4. How long after the flood was it that Christ was born?

Certainly not. 2. Billiards is not a gambling amusement, but an exercise of skill in mathematics, which many are fond of. We know no more harm in it than in bowls, tennis, cricket or golf. 3. About sixty one. 4. The age (according to Ussher's Chronology) is: place in the year of the world 1536, or 23 years before Christ.

G. O. Custer, S. D. Is there any remedy to cure the tobacco habit? There are many so-called "remedies," but we know nothing of their value. The only plain way is to stop using it and ask for Divine strength to overcome the appetite. Make a strong fight and you will conquer.

PS. L. 1. What is the origin of the saying, "as good as Dick's hatband?" 2. What are the national flowers of the leading nations of the world?

The crown of England was called in the time of Richard Cromwell, "Dick's hatband." Things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of the Protector. Thus came the saying, "as queer as Dick's hatband." 2. The United States has no national flower emblem, but many individual States have decided upon a special flower, as representative of their division of country. "State Flowers" are adopted in many instances by the vote of the public school boards of the respective States. Other emblem flowers have been adopted by State legislatures, and still others by the women's clubs of the State. Alabama, the Sunflower; Kansas, Apple Blossom; California, Golden Poppy; Colorado, Columbine, etc. The Rose is the national flower of England; Thistle, Scotland; Shamrock, Ireland; Fleur-de-lis, France; Linden, Prussia; Pomegranate, Spain; Vlet, Greece; White Lily, Italy; Red Lily, the Guelphs.

Subscriber, S. C. Who were the first women to enter professional life, what profession, and when?

1. America, the first profession to be entered by women was the medical. The first woman to graduate from a medical school was Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell. This was in the early fifties. More than two hundred years ago women entered the dramatic profession.

MS. F. Kansas, Ill. I have a silver teaspoon with the words, "The Navarre," carved on the handle. I wish to know the meaning of Navarre, and how the word is pronounced.

Navarre is a province of Spain. In 1589 Henry III, of Navarre became King of France, and united non-Spanish Navarre to the French crown in 1607. The spoon marked "The Navarre" may have belonged to a ship or a hotel of that name. The word is pronounced Navar, accent on last syllable.

J. Limerick, Ireland. When was an officiating minister first introduced to the marriage ceremony in churches, or in the homes of the bride's parents? Have we any mention of such a practice in the Bible?

Early in the history of the Jewish race (as the sacred books show) it was considered desirable that a priest or rabbi should perform the marriage ceremony, as important religious questions had to be put to the bridal pair, which only a learned man could do. In the first centuries (A.D.) Christian marriages were solemnized by the clergy, but there were many exceptions. There was no prescribed form, and the public ceremonies apparently were not regarded as essential by the early Christians. There is no record preserved of the first marriage by a minister.

Mrs. E. P. H., Middletown, Vt. 1. Who is the author of the words:

Counts that day lost, whose low, descending sun Views from thy hand no worthy action done? 2. Why does a regiment, on going into battle, carry a silk flag? Is there any virtue in the silk?

The lines are by Jacob Bobart, an English writer, who died about 1726. 2. There is no special virtue in the silk, but it is used for the flag because it is the richest and lightest available material, will retain its colors longest, and will float from the standard more gracefully than any other material.

Mrs. W. B. M., Wilmet, Ohio. What connection has the rabbit with Easter celebration?

The rabbit is chosen as typical of Easter, the season of renewed life, because this animal is supposed to be more prolific than any other. The idea originated in Germany many years ago.

Distressed, Philadelphia. What should a sincere Christian woman do, who suddenly discovers that her feelings for one with whom she has been associated in Christian work, have passed from friendship to love, when both parties are married?

This is a sorrowful case and may cause much suffering. Heroic measures must be taken. Go into some other sphere of Christian work or to some other church. In any case, avoid association with that person. This is a difficulty in which Christ's advice of the right hand and the right eye must be taken (Matt. 5: 29, 30). It will be hard, but you will have the satisfaction of knowing you are doing right, and God will give you strength. By all means, keep busy. It will be harder for you, if you leave yourself time for brooding. Be stern and firm with yourself, and God will enable you to overcome.

Benj. D. Maxton, N. C. 1. In the Bible we find: "Search the Scriptures daily, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." What is meant by the words "ye think"? 2. Whom does Korea and Manchuria really belong to—Japan or Russia? 3. What is usually paid for short stories?

1. The correct reading (see Revised Version) is, "Ye search . . . for in them ye think," etc., which changes the sense materially and makes explanation unnecessary. 2. To neither. Korea was an independent State and Manchuria was under Chinese rule. 3. It depends wholly upon the literary quality.

A reader, Askaloosa, Iowa. Why is it that the rightful heirs to the Trinity Church property in New York cannot or do not prove their rights?

This question of the rightful ownership of the Trinity Church property has been before the courts for many years, and is still in litigation. The opinion of a layman as to why it has not been settled would be valueless. Consult a lawyer.

G. B., Villard, Minn. Are the ten commandments and the whole Mosaic code abrogated, or are they still binding on Christians?

Christ said he did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil. Yet in several instances he showed that several commands were superseded under his dispensation (Matt. 5: 21-48). The Apostle Paul compared the law to a schoolmaster. That is, that a boy is under rules and orders while he is at school. When he is a man they are no longer necessary. Not that then he might do the things which as a boy he was forbidden, but that he should voluntarily comply with the principles those rules were intended to inculcate. For example, he may have been forbidden to be around town after a certain hour. The object was to keep him out of temptation. As a man he may stay out late, but it is hoped that he is then able to resist temptation. The Christian is not under the law but under grace. He is, therefore, expected to live a better and higher life than if he had been under the law. It is not so much that the law is abrogated, as that he has passed into a region in which he is not disposed to break the law. Of course the ceremonial and dietary parts of the law are not now in force.

M. E. B., Burlington, Vt. What was the cost of the St. Louis Exposition, that is, how much money was expended for site, buildings, etc.?

The people of St. Louis gave $5,000,000 in personal subscriptions; the city voted an additional $5,000,000, and half of beautiful Forest Park as a site. Congress gave $5,000,000 and loaned the fair $4,600,000 more. All this money has been expended in making the grounds, building the palaces, in inducing the co-operation of foreign governments, and in advertising the Exposition.

Joe and Hiram Smith, brothers, were confined in jail in Carthage, eighteen miles from Nauvoo. They were both killed in the jail. I was in sight of the jail, and saw the mob, and heard the firing that killed both.

Astronomical Queries Answered

I AM asked by several querists, as below, to give a more extended description illustrative of what has appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on "Astronomy of the Bible." Queries No. 1 and 2, regarding the evidence of the earth's internal fluidity, must be omitted at present, but will be discussed and answered later. Querist No. 3 asks, "What is meant by the revolution of the earth's orbit in 109,800 years?" Let the querist consider that the earth's orbit is an ellipse, instead of a circle, that the sun is placed at one of the foci, and also that the perihelion of the major axis may point, say, to a certain star. If the orbit did not revolve, it would forever point to the star, unless the star moved.

It has been ascertained, by accurate measurements continued for many years, that the orbit does revolve at the rate of 11.8 seconds of arc a year. Now, in every circle, large or small, there are 360 degrees, 21,600 minutes, and 1,296,000 seconds, which, being divided by 11.8, gives 109,830 years as the period of the orbit's revolution. If the orbit was a circle, with the sun in the centre, this would never happen. The orbits of all the planets are revolving. Querist No. 4, asks why there are to be no eclipses of the moon this year, and if it ever happened before. Yes, it often happens. There never can be but seven eclipses in a year, in which case five will always be of the sun, and two of the moon. All eclipses of both sun and moon occur once in 18 years, 11 days, 7 hours, 42 minutes, forever. In 1898 there were no eclipses of the moon.

As to the question, if the moon and eclipses have any influence on the weather, I answer, No. LEWIS SWIFT.

CLEVER DOCTOR

Ended a 20 Years Trouble Without Any Medicine

A wise Indiana physician ended 20 years stomach disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried allopathic medicines, patent medicines and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally, a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the State, told me medicine would do me no good, only irritating my stomach and making it worse—that I must look to diet, and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking Coffee! Why, what will I drink?'

"Try Postum," said the doctor, 'I drink it, and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious, and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well, that was two years ago, and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again, and I know doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Never too late to mend. Ten days trial of Postum in place of coffee, works wonders. There's a reason.

Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Medical Missionary Work in Mexico

MEDICAL Missionary Levi B. Salmans writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Guanajuato, Mexico, giving an encouraging account of the progress of mission work in that country. He says: "Yours of February 26, with its most helpful donation to our medical work, came to hand duly. Our work has been prospering splendidly. The Federal Government admitted our hospital to incorporation under a new law some three years ago, and we now have the right of mortmain (inalienable tenure or possession), which was denied to everybody in this country for more than forty years. The support of the institution, with its growing School for Nurses—the first of the modern sort here—has depended from the beginning mostly upon the professional medical earnings of the missionary in charge. Two of the students I was supporting in the States graduated and returned to me, and have worked on salary, turning in all their earnings for the work. Since the incorporation of the Good Samaritan Association, its members subscribe and pay $100 a month toward current expenses. With the increase of public favor we are gradually growing in receipts from our in-patients. The Good Samaritan Association determined that it was necessary to try to develop the institution as soon as possible into a fully self-supporting plant, and to that end are raising subscriptions and building a new wing with twenty rooms wholly for the use of private patients, and have already bought and brought to this country several thousands of dollars' worth of apparatus for electricity, heat, light, water, massage, etc. The subscribers who are at the present time helping us seem to be all Catholics here. The few Protestants who are here have helped us before, and will do so again when the present financial stringency passes. We are therefore looking with great earnestness for a few thousand dollars more with which to carry the construction on to such a point at least as to be able to instal the remainder of the machinery and apparatus."

Happy Igorrotes

THE Igorrotes of Central Luzon live in small huts, built in clusters on the slopes of the mountains, where they get the sun and are sheltered from the cold winds, 5,000 feet above the sea. The heat of the tropical sun at midday is very grateful after the cold night and the accompanying fog. They go to school with the babies tied on their backs; but if they have little sisters at home, too small to work in the fields, these will look after the babies. It is not considered necessary that the women and girls should be educated; they are to do the hard work in the fields. The babies are always carried on the backs of the mothers while they work, or on the back of an older child.

It is really wonderful how these people can go about in the cold of these mountains absolutely naked. We, with all our clothes on, feeling cold, realize that they do feel the cold, but have no clothes nor anything to make clothes of. All they have is a coarse cotton cloth, made in various bright colors by the Ilocanos of the lowlands, for which they exchange their camotes (sweet potatoes) and coffee. The men invariably carry a bandala of this cloth, which they wrap around themselves when not exercising, like a toga. With all the seeming hardships of these children of the mountains, they are a very contented and happy lot. The women and girls all carry a musical instrument made of a piece of bamboo, which has one end split; this end they hit against the palm of the hand, the other end has holes in it, over which they place the fingers to vary the sounds. It is crude and weird music, but they are happy with it.

CORNISH Pianos and Organs

Thousands of Homes

are without music because good pianos and organs sold through dealers cost so much. Cornish Pianos are as expensive as any to make, but cost so much less to sell that you save $150 to $250 by buying from the manufacturer. Cornish organs are sold at proportionate savings. We have no agents and never sell to dealers—you can buy of us at factory prices.

Your Address on a Postal

A New Cornish Model

Sent on a Year's Trial FREE

Without any money in advance we will ship (freight prepaid) any Cornish Piano or Organ you may select and guarantee safe delivery. Test it for 30 days, and if it is not exactly as we represent it, or if you are not fully satisfied and do not believe it equal to any you can buy of local dealers for one third to one-half more money, return it at our expense. If you buy, payment may be made in cash or easy instalments as you prefer. Furthermore, we agree to refund the full amount paid us with 6 per cent. interest added if the instrument is not entirely satisfactory after a year's use in your own home.

If Cornish Pianos and Organs were not thoroughly good and reliable, would we dare bind ourselves to this contract as we do?

Our Catalogue describes Cornish Organs as well as Pianos. Write for it.

SPRING

BRIGHT spring has come!
Fierce lightnings flash the sky around,
Loud thunders shake the solid ground:
Yet flowers sweet serenely smile
O'er many and many and many a mile,
For spring has come!

What, though the sturdy oak is riven
With bolt-of-fire shot down from heaven!
Still forests dense in sunny aisles
Wave far and near a thousand miles.

From "lakes to gulf" and sea-girt lands,
On rock-ribbed steepes and gleaming strands,
On dell and glade and dizzy height,
The sun pours down his shafts of light.

In bud and bloom, nor soon nor late,
From "ocean shore to Golden Gate"
Stand clustered growths in serried files,
With airy grace three thousand miles!

Aye, spring has come!
The groves are filled with melody,
The lawns resound with youthful glee,
From shore to shore in happy lays
All join to sing their Maker's praise.
For spring has come!

A Life Story on Canvas

It may be a very extraordinary statement to make, but there is little doubt that ninety-nine per cent of the men who find their way to a life of misery and despair on the Bowery, come there through the instrumentality of the drink curse. The Bowery Mission, therefore, gladly welcomes the co-operation of all temperance workers.

A large audience assembled on a recent Saturday evening to listen to an illustrated lecture by Mr. F. C. Crass, of the Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C. Mr. Crass is quite a young man, but of the most earnest type of Christian, and he has consecrated his art and his leisure to Gospel Temperance work. His lecture was entitled "Sowing to the Wind," and was illustrated by thirty-two large, water-color sketches from his own hand. He is a fluent and impressive speaker and easily held the attention of the Bowery audience. The pictures were placed on an easel which stood on the platform, immediately under the electric light, and could therefore be seen to the utmost limits of the hall. The first pictures dealt with the innocent home life of a bright young fellow in a country home in the far West. The young man is full of ambition, and yields easily to the persuasion of a glib-tongued drummer to come to New York City. When once the young man is found in New York, the pictures are made to deal with the many points of beauty and interest to be found in the metropolis, its parks, docks, buildings, etc. Then comes a change over the life of the young fellow, as he yields to the city temptations. Sketches of the resorts of pleasure follow and illustrate, as Hogarth did of old, the "Rake's Progress" downwards to the inevitable end—a drunkard's grave in Potter's Field. Then came some beautiful pictures of the Cross, illustrating the way of salvation, which afforded the lecturer a basis for a most stirring appeal to his hearers. This was responded to by a great number of men, and the lecture will be remembered by many for a long time to come.

Mr. Crass may be communicated with at H St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

A Priest in Battle

"I have twice seen Russian priests rally troops and lead them back into battle after their own officers had lost control over them," writes a Russian ex-officer. "The first time was at Plevna, during the Russo-Turkish War. A battalion ordered to attack one of the breaches was met by such a withering fire from the Turks, that most of the officers and nearly a third of the men were shot down in a few moments. The battalion wavered, hung back, and was on the point of breaking. The priest attached to the battalion—the regimental chaplain—rushed to the front holding aloft an ikon, shouted to the men to charge for God and the Czar, and went ahead himself. They followed with a cheer, drove back the Turks and held the breach for a time. The other incident happened during Skobeloff's victorious campaign against the Mero Turcomans in 1882. Just before the siege of Geok Tepe, an engagement was fought, in which the Russian forces were severely handled by some captured field pieces worked by the Turcomans. They had been taken during the rout of a previous expedition led against the Turcomans by Gen. Lomakin. The Russians were eager to recapture the guns. But attack after attack failed, until at last a priest, mounted upon a great white horse, rallied the regiment, the Pereshah Dragons, which was actually in a mad rout, and took the guns by a furious charge that bore comparison with the charge of the six hundred at Balaklava."

Crossing the Down-Town Ferries

CROSSING the down-town ferries, I challenge a braver sight, Than the throngs of working-people Homeward faring at night. Never a drum before them, Never a banner above, But they march to soundless music Under the flag of love.

There are men with grimy faces And coats that are out of date, Women whose pallid lips and cheeks Tell the dreary struggle with fate. But oh! the cheery courage And the eyes with light aglow, As over the down-town ferries These toilers come and go!

They are working for wife and babies, For a mother bent and gray, Or a sister bound to a weary couch, With only the strength to pray. Working for honest wages To pay for the bread they eat, Or to buy the children's school-books, And shoes for the children's feet.

Crossing the down-town ferries Daily at set of sun, You may meet the crowds of toilers Whose long day's work is done. You know what a shout of greeting They'll hear when they lift the latch—A shout the angels listen for, And pause in the songs to catch.

Who does not thrill with pleasure As the brave procession comes, Needing no rally of bugles, Nor beat of strenuous drums? Though a host may press near them Who neither toil nor spin, Not theirs to wear the laurels The lowlier laborers win.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Answered Prayers

A. E. C., Wichita, Kan. "I want to publicly acknowledge God's great mercy to me, in hearing and answering my prayer."

Mrs. John G., Walnut, Ia. "I prayed for my dear and only son. God answered. Praise his holy name. He alone can save."

D. M. A. "We wish to acknowledge our thankfulness to God for answering our prayers. Praise be to God. He knows what is best."

Mrs. T. "I believe God will always answer our prayers if we ask believing and it is for our own good to have the prayer granted us."

H. P., Albany, N. Y. "I firmly believe in prayer, and that 'whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name, he will give it you' (St. John 16: 23)."

D. H. W., David City, Neb. "I read answered prayers list every week, and I must say it is a guide for me to remember my Lord in time of trouble."

Mary M. L., Ann Arbor, Mich. "He hears and answers prayer. Oh that all would praise the Lord for his goodness, for this wonderful work to the children of men."

M. F. B., Baileyville, Kan. "The Lord does hear and answer prayer. He has answered mine. Let no one doubt his power, or willingness to answer all prayers that are made to him in faith."

I. M. H., West Chester, Chester Co., Pa. "A dear sister has been at death's door. I went to God and asked him to spare her to us, if it was his will; she is better, and I know he answered my prayers."

S. E. C., White's Creek, Tenn. "I promised that if he would answer my prayer, I would acknowledge it, and he has. Praise his name. He will hear every one who will trust him and wait patiently."

A. H. W., Ills. "I can truly say that God has always answered my prayers when it was best, and I know if we come to him with faith, believing in his mercy even in little things, he will bless us. Praise his holy name."

Constant Reader. "I have had many marvelous answers to prayer. Lately in great trouble, I promised that when deliverance came I would acknowledge it, so that some other fainting one might be helped. God has answered abundantly."

Mr. and Mrs. R. E. J., Warm Springs, Mont. "We were in great trouble, and we promised that if He would hear and answer our prayers and deliver us, we would acknowledge our thankfulness for his great mercy. He has answered, even though the help has oftentimes come late, we believe it has always been in the best."

Rev. John A. Kees, Minn. "God, in his great mercy, has answered my prayers very many times, and so apparent and real have been these answers, that I could not doubt from whence my deliverance came. Sometimes these answers came in the form of recovery from sickness, sometimes in the form of deliverance from great physical peril, as once, when it seemed that I must inevitably be dashed to pieces by runaway horses. At other times, the answer has come in the form of deliverance from financial disaster. There have been times when I have done all I could to avert calamity, without avail; then I carried my cares to Him who hears the young ravens when they cry, and shortly the danger was past. I have lived for nearly forty years to preach the Gospel of the Kingdom, and testify to the efficacy of prayer."

WHAT THE KING EATS

What's Fit for Him

A Mass. lady, who has been through the mill with the trials of the usual housekeeper and mother, relates an interesting incident that occurred not long ago. She says:

"I can, with all truthfulness, say that Grape Nuts is the most beneficial of all cereal food in my family, young as well as old. It is food and medicine both, to us. A few mornings ago, at breakfast, my little boy said:

"Mama, does the King eat Grape-Nuts every morning?"

"I smiled and told him I did not know but that I thought Grape-Nuts certainly made a delicious dish, fit for a King." (It's a fact that the King of England and the German Emperor both eat Grape-Nuts).

"I find that by the constant use of Grape-Nuts, not only as a morning cereal, but also in puddings, salads, etc., made after the delicious recipes found in the little book in each package, it is proving to be a great nerve food for me, besides having completely ended a long standing case of indigestion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is no doubt Grape-Nuts is the most scientific food in the world.

Ten days trial of this proper food, in place of improper food, will show in steady, stronger nerves, sharper brain, and the power to "go" longer and further and accomplish more. There's a reason. Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

CAN YOU USE A MARKER, HEADSTONE, TOMBSTONE OR MONUMENT TO MARK THE GRAVE OF YOUR DEPARTED?

IF YOU CAN BUY the finished stone, the best workmanship possible at one-third the prices others charge, if you could get from us a handsome, large, beautifully carved and finished Monument or Elaborate Tombstone, which, when set up on your lot, would cost you much less money than you would have to pay for a plain, even for the smallest headstone or marker, if you knew you could do this, would you not write for our FREE TOMBSTONE CATALOGUE? WRITE FOR OUR FREE TOMBSTONE CATALOGUE and you will receive by return mail the handsomest tombstone catalogue ever published; many beautiful illustrations, showing all styles, kinds and sizes in Markers, Headstones, Tombstones, and Monuments, a big variety of marble, all colorings, color samples, descriptions, suggestions for lettering new and special ideas for carving, shaping, designing, lettering, etc.

OUR LOW PRICES WILL SURPRISE YOU, a mere fraction of the prices charged by others. Why we use better stone and marble, why our designing, finishing, carving and lettering is better than you would be likely to get elsewhere at 3 to 5 times our prices is fully explained. OUR PAY AFTER RECEIVED TERMS, our style, quality and satisfaction guarantee will be fully explained. You will get our very latest monument and tombstone offer, the most astonishingly liberal proposition ever heard of. Don't fail to write for OUR FREE TOMBSTONE CATALOGUE TODAY if at all interested. GUILTY SILENCE*

The Duty the Christian Owes of Giving Testimony for Christ

WHEN Christ saves a man, he expects him to give testimony. The man may not be able to preach, but the slowest tongue can declare that Christ has become a personal Saviour in very deed. In a law court the witness does not need to be eloquent, nor to deal with large questions; what is required of him is to state facts within his personal knowledge. The best witness for the skill of a physician is the man who can say, "I was sick, and have been cured by this doctor." Better than all argument with a man suffering from a particular disease, is the simple statement from a man who has had the same disease, that the doctor has restored the witness to health. He becomes a living testimony to his skill. Nothing is so effective as this. A man who is bruised by sin, who has tried to shake it off and has failed; a man who despairs of ever getting deliverance from the bondage of evil habit, takes new heart when some one in his hearing declares that he too was enchained and that Christ has set him free. It is due to Christ and an act of humanity to our fellow-men to let it be known, if through Christ we have become better and happier men.

What must the world think of a silent Christian? If religion is all that it claims to be, if it has the power of changing a man's very nature, the world must be astonished at his silence. Does he want to keep the secret of happiness to himself? Is it not rather, the world argues, that the power of religion has been overrated and that it effects no such change as it professes to do? Thus Christ's work loses the influence which legitimately belongs to it and the world loses the knowledge to which it is justly entitled. The mischief a silent Christian does is therefore more than negative. His silence induces doubt and discredits religion. There is no honorable way of evading the duty of testimony. There are circumstances in which it requires courage, but what must be thought of a man who, believing that Christ has laid down his life to save him, permits the fear of ridicule, or the dread of loss, to seal his lips?

Men that were lepers. What gave Gough the power that he had with the drunkard? Was it not the fact that he had been so completely under the curse of drink that he had suffered from delirium tremens? Men, as they listened to him, said, "if that man was saved, I may be." No one who heard Jerry McAuley's talks with the degraded men who used to fill the big room he opened in Water Street, New York, would give him credit for oratorical ability, yet the number of lost men whom he led to Christ is astonishing. It was his testimony that did it. He bore witness to the power that had saved him. He himself was won by testimony. The talk that brought him to Christ's feet was the testimony of a man in prison, who had been saved. So it has been with others. It is the word of a man who says "I know; I feel; I have experienced this power" that is effective, and every man who has been saved can utter those words.

Giving him thanks. A great preacher in New York used to tell the story of his grandfather, who was a miller. He was taking a sack of flour to a customer, who lived on the other side of a hill, in Scotland. As he went, the sack, which was on the horse's back, fell off. He tried again and again to replace it, but could not. He waited, longing for some one to come to his help, and at last was gladdened by seeing a man approach. But when the man came near, the miller recognized him as the great Laird of the county. He could not ask help of this nobleman. But the Laird saw the difficulty, and took hold of one end of the sack, while the miller took the other, and they soon had it in place. The miller was profuse in his thanks. "The best way to thank me," said the Laird, "is for you, whenever you see another man in the plight you were in just now, to go to his assistance." That is Christ's rule. He appreciates best the help we give to another man who needs to be taught how he may be saved.

PROPHETIC STUDY

Suggested Clues to the Solution of Difficult Problems

MANY Christians in these ration-alistic days, appear willing to go without the blessing promised (Rev. 1: 3) to him that read-eth and to them that hear the words of prophecy. Yet the promise is explicit and is in line with the fact that so large a portion of the Word of God is occupied with the prophecies. We cannot suppose that they were inserted there without definite purpose, or that so impressive a part of revelation can be safely neglected.
They were intended to prepare men for events which will certainly occur in the future, that as the apostle said (I. Thess.
5: 4), the Christian might not be in darkness and might not be among those whom that day would overtake as a thief.

Doubtless many are discouraged in undertaking the study, by the difficulty of the subject, and by the mistakes which have been made by students who have endeavored to interpret the unfulfilled predictions. Others, too, are like those in Apostolic times who had looked for the return of Christ, and because he did not come when they expected him, said, "Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (II. Peter 3: 4).
But the very fact that such remarks are made, is itself a fulfilment of the prophecy, that in the last days scoffers would appear, saying just those things.

It is natural that in dealing with a subject so complicated there should be wide divergence of opinion among expositors;
but it is remarkable that every one who undertakes to write on the subject sheds some new light upon it, and even when his final conclusions prove erroneous, is sure to elucidate some mysterious passage and solve some difficult problem that has perplexed others. It is clearly part of the blessing promised to the diligent student, who thus contributes to the general knowledge of the subject. A further effort in this direction has just appeared in a new edition of Forty Future Wonders, by Rev. M. Baxter, of London, the earlier editions of which work have been widely read in England and in this country.

As in his earlier works, Mr. Baxter devotes his attention, in his new book, chiefly to the prophecies in the book of Daniel, as they are amplified and particularized in the book of Revelation. He believes that both the expositors who have adopted the year-day theory and those who hold the literal day theory will prove correct, as the prophecies will be fulfilled in both ways. Thus the 2,375 days have an initial fulfilment of a year for a day and have also a literal fulfilment in the interval which will occur between the future command to rebuild Jerusalem, and the close of the age. When this command is issued it will therefore be clear that in 2,375 days, or about six years and a-half, the end of the age will occur.

A careful and exhaustive study, extremely interesting to students of prophecy, is made of the various periods mentioned in Holy Writ, with the object of ascertaining the probable dates of the events which are to mark the close of the dispensation. How difficult it is to harmonize these dates every student knows.
One interesting clue to the solution of the problem is suggested by Mr. Baxter in the difference between the calendar of the East and that of the West. It is remarkable, as he shows, that the discrepancy in two of those periods, which has perplexed many students, disappears, if it is remembered that the Mohammedan year is shorter than the solar year. Thus the 1,335 years of Daniel 12: 12 must really, if they are Mohammedan years, as seems probable from other references, count in the calculation as 1,295 years. If that number be added to 636—the year in which the Mohammedans captured Jerusalem—we have the date 1931. Other periods converging from different points of origin end at the same date, from which the inference is drawn that in that year the final consummation will occur.

The Problem of the Poor

Many Christian Herald Readers Offer Suggestions as to its Solution

FROM thoughtful readers in many States, responses have come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation for a general expression of opinion on the question: "How can the deserving poor be most effectually helped?" It is a problem of universal interest for all classes. These letters represent many shades of opinion, and form a sociological symposium that will be read with unusual appreciation:

Teach Economy and Simple Living

Doubling the income of every toiler in the land would not lessen to any extent the number of those who are always in debt. Drunkenness is usually an incident rather than a cause of poverty. It does little good to preach economy to a man who has a small income and a large family to support. Yet want of economy is the root of nearly all poverty. How can you help the poor? If you have wealth or simply independence, live and dress simply. You not only teach economy by example, but your simpler life will make theirs easier to bear in contrast. The money saved, if turned into the channels of trade, will help to give employment and wages, rather than being a dead loss, as it would have been if wasted in extravagance. Teach the child early the lessons of earning and saving. The child who spends every cent it can get for candy, has laid the foundation for poverty. Teach by precept and example that a dollar in the pocket is a better friend than the ones bought by it if spent in treating. Help every young man you can to own a home of his own, however humble. Your success, even at some loss, will probably remove that man from any danger of extreme poverty.

Grasmere, N. H. S. E. AIKEN.

An Endowment Fund to Create Self-Help

Establish an endowment fund for the deserving poor, on somewhat the following plan: 1. That at least $100,000,000 be raised. 2. That a board of trustees be appointed. 3. That land be bought and sold to the poor in quantities of five or ten acres on terms of fifteen, twenty or more years. 4. That money be loaned to buy land, build houses, or to equip a small dairy, poultry yard, berry farm, or market garden. 5. That a very low rate of interest be charged, say two per cent. Every effort should be put forth to draw the poor people from the city to the country. Fresh air is one of the greatest factors in civilization.

I was born a slave in 1859. In the month of March 1868, my father, with my mother and three of their children, walked two hundred and fifty miles, in order to find a place in which he could make a living. He found a man who rented us a farm on the most liberal terms. We entered the log cabin on this farm with just what we carried on our backs. Our first bedstead was some fence-rails with stones for posts. But since that time I have graduated from college, and am now a teacher in a State school. Each year I pay thirty dollars taxes on real estate. The greatest need of the deserving poor, is to help them buy land and build houses in the country. "The only help which may safely be given to individuals, is the help that aids and increases self-help."

Institute, W. Va. B. PRILLERMAN.

Apply the Christian Rule to Labor

Once on a time a man called at the home of a wealthy gentleman asking charity. He had no food and no money. "Why don't you work?" was the somewhat rude demand. "I can find no work." "I will give you work. You see that pile of wood? I do not want it there. You may bring it and pile it here." The man tackled the job, bringing the wood a stick at a time, and piled it at the designated place. When it was finished, the gentleman said: "Well, it don't suit me. Carry it back and pile it just where you found it." The man did as he was told, and was paid for his labor enough to supply his present need.

This fable—a real occurrence many years ago—teaches a foundation principle in the relief of the poor. No man able to work should ask or expect to receive charity. He has a right to employment, and to live upon the fruit of his labor. In studying the "problem of the poor," two chief causes of honorable poverty demand attention, viz.: the uncertainty of employment and the inequality of compensation. Just now there is a good demand for labor, yet many men are but partially employed. The time is approaching, if it be not already here, when it becomes the duty of the State to take supervision of the whole matter of employment, and see that every man has something to do.

The large body of working men receive scanty wages, just a bare subsistence, and cannot lay aside for a rainy day. We must adopt the Christian law of wages (Matt. 20: 1-16). The Great Teacher there proclaims the principle that the reward of labor is not at all in proportion to the quantity or value of the product; a principle separated by a whole hemisphere from all our present methods. Before the kingdom of heaven can be set up on earth, we must revise our systems of political economy. Until these conditions are corrected, the "problem of the poor" will remain, and become each year more acute.

A Co-operative Commonwealth

1. Establish a Co-operative Commonwealth.
2. Form industrial departments, employing all able-bodied men and women.
3. Use credit time checks instead of money.
4. Public pleasure resorts free for all old and infirm.
5. Public schools furnished free for all children under 21.

Tribune, Kan. ROBERT PRINGLE.

Profit-Sharing the Laborer's Due

In two recent numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the remedy has been broadly hinted at, viz.: Dr. Watson's remarks upon the next great revival; also an answer to a question in THE MAIL-BAG. "No. 150, Census Bulletin, of 1904, makes the statement that $2,451 is the average product of labor per laborer, yet labor receives but $437.00 of that product in wages, leaving $2,014 that profit takes." Give the laborer the full product of his labor, minus the actual cost of distribution, and there will be no poor, except from dissipation and disease. Abolish interest, rent, profit, and there will be no millionaires, and but few helpless. Taking $2,014 out of the product of the laborer, can not be done as it is without doing to others that which we would not have them do to us.

Economy and Model Tenements

Any effort which aims at the relief of the worthy poor, to be effective, must first recognize, and, as far as possible, remove the cause of continued poverty. The class we are considering, (1) pays more for rent (in the great majority of instances) than the wretched accommodations furnished are worth; (2) pays three or four times as much for fuel as their well-to-do neighbors; (3) pays more for food, quality considered, than their well-to-do neighbors; (4) pays more, far more, for furnishings, including clothing, than the shoddy stuff they purchase is worth. So that, as under these four heads are comprehended practically all necessary expenditures, the very people least able to afford it are compelled to pay most for the necessities of life, and therefore it is that that the poor remain poor. Remove these handicaps, and to that extent you may banish poverty. Compare the average prices of the tenement-house basement small store with those prevailing at the average retailer's, and, quality entirely apart, one could hardly expect to save money by transferring one's patronage to the tenement-house dealer. Had I the power to banish at the wave of the magician Wealth's wand, the four squares of squalor embraced within "Lung Block," I would rebuild around a hollow courtyard, four blocks of three-story, six-room homes, into every one of whose six hundred rooms (there being twenty-five houses to a block), God's air and sunlight should freely enter. Underground pipes would convey the lighting and heat there generated (from coal costing $3 a ton), to illumine and warm the surrounding one hundred homes, the same power being utilized for laundry, cleansing, cooking, sewing machines, etc. The discriminating provider and purveyor for our hundred homes would have no difficulty in renting to the worthy poor, at a fair return, his furnished, lighted and heated homes, not flats, at a weekly rental (made possible by the fourfold economies which this plan suggests) actually less than the present weekly outgo in the squalid "Lung Block" tenements.

Baltimore, Md. EDWARD MARKELL.

Socialism the Remedy

Equal rights for men and women. Educate all children up to the age of twenty-one at the expense of the State. What the people collectively use, the people must collectively own. The abolishment of all contract labor. Every able-bodied man and woman of voting age, to be guaranteed the right to employment, at any occupation required by society, that they may choose. Eliminate all useless labor. Such labor as is called for by insurance, traveling salesmen, and representatives of any private institution, is unnecessary and very expensive. Every person of voting age to have a voice in the making of all laws by which they are to be governed. A recognition of the truth that labor creates all wealth, and the protection by society of its wealth producers, will banish poverty, ignorance, crime, vice, superstition, insanity and suicide. The right of recall of representatives and the means whereby we will be enabled to do so, will make every voter responsible for the laws and abolish the selling of public offices and the giving away of franchises, by enabling the people at any time to construct and operate machinery for the purpose of production and distribution of wealth. In short, the only way to abolish poverty is to make it possible for the people to engage in producing and distributing wealth, for use and not for profit.

Angus, Minn. FRED A. WILSON.

Send them to the Harvest-fields

Last year thousands of dollars were lost because of lack of help in harvesting crops. Women are wrecking health on farms from overwork, because house-helpers cannot be found. Farmers are seriously talking of letting fields grow to weeds, because the help being scarce, is too expensive. If workers and work can be brought together, this country would give employment to thousands of willing men and women, who could gain a livelihood, maintain self-respect, and by practicing thrift and frugality get ahead in the world.

Great Bend, Kan. W. J.

Close Up the Saloons

Stop making paupers, by closing up the saloons, and other places where intoxicating liquors are sold, and where untold thousands are reduced to the pauper class, who, otherwise, would be self-supporting. Some arrangement should be made by which the surplus of able-bodied men and women in the cities can be scattered through the rural districts, to help farmers and their wives, who at present are suffering a great loss for want of such help. Colonize the poor after the plan of the Salvation Army, giving each adult the opportunity to become the owner of real estate.

McBride, La. MARCELLUS PALMER.

A Great Co-operative Employment Plan

Underlying all human action is the motive which induces that action. Careful analysis reveals that the universal motive is patriotic desire to earn, as nearly as possible, a livelihood, or living, and thus be no burden to any person or institution. If it be true that this class of the poor desires to labor because of the motive suggested, it inevitably follows that any successful attempt to solve this problem, must provide means of employment adequate to satisfy this motive, as universally, or as nearly universally, as possible. Therefore, since the average man (almost equally with the average lower animal of every description) is a victim of surroundings, he must have work adapted to him to begin with.

Your Mont-Lawn, illustrating what may be done in joyous transformation of the tenement wail as it does, is a miniature of what may be done with the worthy adult. And this leads to the proposition that agriculture, the farm, the rural district, offers the largest field for the greatest variety of labor conducive to physical and moral regeneration. Thus by all the varieties of farming, gardening, orcharding, stock raising, dairying, etc., many persons can be constantly employed on a comparatively small area of territory.

The only rational general conclusion I am able to reach concerning the best systematic relief for the worthy poor, is, that a great co-operative association, officered and managed by competent, righteous persons, equipped furnish employment in all varieties possible every kind of industry, labor, or work, would soon surprise Christendom, by revealing that much of what now seems to be defunct citizenship could be rehabilitated; and the evolution of this co-operative system might soon be seen in the re-uniting of a liberated and happy people—a people enabled to provide for all necessities and many luxuries through out their remaining pilgrimage on earth.

Columbia, Mo. JNO. S. WILLIS.

Form Agricultural Colonies

Get them into the country. Along the roads are vast areas of land, producing little else than daisies and wild carrot. Secure tracts of such land, divide into small plots, erect cottages, place deserving poor families on them, and let them raise vegetables, berries, etc., for the city markets. As soon as they have paid the cost price of their home, give them a deed. The worthy poor will soon help himself, if given a start, but he can make start without money. The original cornerstone of American success is the farm.

Scotia, N. Y. CHAS. C. R. METZGER.

A National Work Suggested

I would suggest that the government our grand nation close every dram-shop, our land and strictly enforce our Sabbath laws, then take the money that is used to provide for criminals, which the rum traffic has caused, and harness the water that flows from the snow-capped mountains on our Western plains, and when this has been done, send the poor people out there and give them home of their own. For those who cannot work have infirmaries built; those who will not work ought not to eat.

Chillicothe, Mo. ELLEN DEIGHMAN.

Make Them Self-Helpful

Send them suitable literature, giving good practical advice on economy, thrift, and good management. What the vast majority of the poor need is something to lift up the ideals, arouse their enthusiasm, and inspire them with courage and ambition. Ignorance is the cause of much of the poverty existing in the world. Teach the poor to help themselves instead of depending on charity.

Charlottesville, P. E. I. ANNIE RODD.

Found Agricultural Communities

Have the wealthy class pool their contributions, and establish in several States large agricultural communities, where all sober, honest men can find employment at fair wages. Furnish cosy homes for each family at a fair rent, with land enough to make a nice garden. Employ none but those who will sign the pledge. This will give the deserving poor a chance to rise by their own labor.

Disston City, Fla. WM. P. WOODWORTH.

A Farmer's Remedy

For nearly forty years my occupation has always been that of farming. Now Texas the South and Southwest, generally contain thousands and millions of acres of fertile land untouched by plough or agricultural pursuit. In these boundless prairies and forests I have often thought—what a great pleasure it would be to me if I had money at my command, like a great many people in the large cities of the East, to colonize those "deserving poor" and bring them out to these vast bodies of land and purchase for them farms, teams, etc., setting them up in a good, legitimate, and self-sustaining business of their own, while I would take their notes and obligations to pay for these homes, giving them ample time so they could make their living and support themselves meantime, and thus become, instead of a starving lot of poor people suffering privation of every description, a lot of enterprising, self-sustaining and independent people, in homes of their own. How much better such a plan as this would be for people out of employment.

To Plan for the World's Peace

PREPARATIONS FOR THE COMING INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS IN BOSTON--THE WHOLE COUNTRY INTERESTED

AS was briefly announced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, an International Peace Congress has been called to meet in Boston next October, which is looked forward to with deep interest by peace-lovers throughout the world. It will be the thirteenth International Peace Congress, and the second ever held in this country, the first having been held in Chicago during the World's Fair of 1893.

America has always taken a conspicuous part in the World's Peace Congresses. It was in Boston that the idea of the first International Peace Congress was suggested, and to that city also belongs the distinction of having founded the first influential Peace Society in the world. It was in the study of William Ellery Channing, in Boston, one December day in 1815, that the Massachusetts Peace Society was organized. America has had no more earnest or eloquent believer in the practicability of universal peace than Charles Sumner, who bequeathed a fund to Harvard College, the income to be used for an annual prize for the best essay on the methods by which war may be permanently proscribed.

The founder of the Massachusetts Peace Society was Noah Webster, and the originator of the American Peace Society was William Ladd. These two societies have now become one, and for many years the headquarters have been in Boston, where the earnest men and women comprising the Executive Committee have in charge the carrying through of the Congress in Boston as a successful termination. In all likelihood the President of the Congress will be the Hon. Robert Treat Paine, who is the great-grandson of one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He is one of Boston's best known and most active philanthropists and has given a helping hand to any good causes. He organized the Wells Memorial Workingmen's Institute and is still its president. He is also president of the Workingmen's Co-operative Bank, and is for more than a quarter of a century past president of the Associated Charities of Boston. Mr. Paine and his wife created and endowed with two hundred thousand dollars a trust for charitable purposes called the Robert Treat Paine Association. He has long been associated with the American Peace Society, and is one of the firmest believers in the value and the ultimate triumph of the peace movement.

Mr. Edwin D. Mead, chairman of the Executive Committee, is one of the public-spirited men of Boston, and may always be depended upon to champion any cause having for its object the uplifting of humanity and the growing good of the world. He is a forcible speaker, and has always taken an active interest in educational affairs. Few men are better informed in regard to historical matters than he. The secretary of the American Peace Society and also of the Executive Committee is Benjamin F. Trueblood, a member of the Society of Friends, a writer of unusual ability, and one of the foremost speakers at the international meetings for many years past. Dr. Trueblood devotes his entire time to the work of the American Peace Society, and travels thousands of miles every year in the interest of Lincoln, is another member of the Executive Committee. Mr. Seward has been our Consul-General to China, and received the appointment of Minister to Corea, but at his own suggestion the sending of a mission to Corea was deferred. He is a member of a number of clubs and organizations working for the public good. Phillip C. Garrett, of Philadelphia, another member, is a retired manufacturer who devotes the greater part of his time to philanthropic work and the interests of the Peace Society. He was appointed by President Harrison to the Board of Indian Commissioners and is president of the Philadelphia Board of Public Charities. He has been president of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections and also president of the Mohawk Indian Conference. Other members of the Executive Committee are Hon. William N. Ashman, of Philadelphia, a Judge of the Orphans' Court; Dr. Richard H. Thomas, of Baltimore, a minister of the Society of Friends, and for ten years dean of the Woman's Medical College of Baltimore; Edwin Burritt Smith, of Chicago, and Prof. Graham Taylor, of the Christian Sociology Congregational Seminary, the founder and resident warden of the Chicago Commons Social Settlement.

There are three ladies on the Executive Committee of the Peace Congress. One of them is a Quakeress, Mrs. Hannah Bailey, of Winthrop Centre, Me., a lady of large means, who devotes her time to religious, educational and philanthropic work. Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell, of New York City, is a member of the Executive Committee, and is intensely interested in the peace movement. Mrs. May Wright Sewell, of Indianapolis, the twelfth member of the Executive Committee, has, for more than thirty years been actively identified with educational, benevolent and philanthropic organizations. She represented Indiana at the International Cotton Exposition in New Orleans, and in 1900, President McKinley appointed her special representative of the organized work of her countrywomen in the series of Congresses held at the Exposition Universelle, in Paris.

On the general committee of the forthcoming Peace Congress, are such names as Edward Everett Hale, Hon. John W. Foster, Hon. Andrew D. White, David Starr Jordan, Andrew Carnegie, George Foster Peabody, Julia Ward Howe, Hon. Oscar S. Strauss, Bishop Henry Warren, Miss M. Carey Thomas and others. Andrew Carnegie has given $5,000 toward the expenses of the Congress, and it is expected that at least $25,000 will be secured for this purpose. Tremont Temple has been secured for the Congress, and supplementary meetings will be held in other cities. A statue to the great advocate of universal peace, Elihu Burritt, may be unveiled in New Britain, Conn. (his native town), at the close of the Congress.

J. L. HARBOUR.

Unpraised Heroes

TEXT — Matt. 19: 30: Many that are first shall be last; and the last shall be first

FROM time immemorial, nations have honored their military chieftains. All Carthage knelt in reverence before the tombs of Hamilcar and Hannibal. All Sweden honors the sacred dust of Gustavus Adolphus and of Marshal Bernadotte, who afterwards ascended the throne as King Charles the XIV. All Germany reveres the name of Frederick the Great and Count von Moltke. All Italy praises Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel. In England, the Duke of Wellington and Lord Napier sleep within St. Paul's Cathedral under the most magnificent dome of all London. Westminster Abbey is the last resting-place of scores of generals and admirals who have made England's name famous upon the land and upon the sea.

Not only do the modern nations honor their dead military chieftains, but also the living soldiers who have shed their blood upon hard-fought battle-fields. They honor not their generals only, but the humble privates who once carried the muskets in the ranks, or the petty non-commissioned officers, or the lieutenants, or captains of small company commands. When these soldiers die, they are laid in the grave with military honors. When, as worn-out veterans they are unable to look after themselves, then the best of "Soldier Homes" are provided for their housement. England has placed the Royal Palace in the Isle of Wight, where Queen Victoria passed most of her life, at the service of her convalescent sailors. France has her beautiful retreat of the Invalides for her aged soldiers, in the midst of which is the huge sarcophagus of her greatest warrior, whose dying request was this: "It is my wish that my ashes may repose on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people whom I loved so well." The finest sites near our own national capital, and Milwaukee and Danville and Santa Monica, are filled with the veterans of our own army, who were just as brave as any that wore the Confederate gray or the Federal blue, who laid down their lives upon the blood-soaked soil of Vicksburg, Chancellorsville, Lookout Mountain, or Atlanta.

Heroic Renunciation

Though on this Memorial Sabbath we specially honor the heroes who laid down their lives on the battle-field, or who survived the war, to die afterwards of their wounds, or of disease brought on by the exposure and the hardships of the war, I want to call your attention this morning to men who rendered other kinds of service in the great struggle. That conflict could never have been fought out, if some who did not go to the front, had not loyally done their duty in other spheres. There were some who would gladly have shouldered a musket and gone to the war, but renounced their share in the danger and the glory of the battle, that they might render less conspicuous, but no less essential service to their country. Let us give them, too, their meed of praise.

On this Memorial Day, I praise the unpraised Southerner as well as the unpraised Northerner. I believe the Civil War, bloody as it was; awful and terrific as it was, mortal as it was, with 1,000,000 dead, was worth all the sacrifice it cost. Why? Because, once and for all, it settled the vital and far-reaching question that the United States Government forever, was to be bounded on the east by the Atlantic, on the west by the Pacific, on the north by the Great Lakes, and on the south by the Gulf. Though the United States proper comprises an area of 3,025,600 square miles, yet in that vast area, great as it is, there will never be room for more than one government, any more than two queens can live within the same bee-hive. This question of one government had to be settled once for all, by the sword. If it had not been settled by a bloody conflict between the North and the South, it certainly would have had to be settled later by a bloody conflict between the East and the West. Thus I honor to-day the unpraised hero, who, in 1861, lived below the Mason and Dixon line, as well as the unpraised hero of Michigan and Pennsylvania, and New York and Maine.

First, on this Memorial Day, let us honor the statesmen in the cabinet, and the legislators in the Capitol, who conducted the national government during those four years of trial. In the Northern Capitol at Washington, and in the Confederate Capitol at Richmond, there were men as brave as those in the armies. Their duties were onerous, their responsibilities serious, their patriotism intense. Let us raise the national flag over the dead bodies of the senators and the congressmen, who valiantly stood at their posts during those awful years of carnage, as well as put a wreath of flowers upon the graves of the men who died at South Mountain, Antietam, or Fredericksburg.

It is so easy to speak sneeringly of our Washington legislators. It is so easy to call the "United States Senate" the "Millionaires' Assembly," or the "Club of the Old Fogies." It is so easy to say the House of Representatives is a collection of nonentities, who are ruled for the most part by one or two men who crack the party whip over the backs of their fellows. But, my friends, I believe that by such speeches injustice is often done to able men. We have a right to assume that men who have been chosen by their fellow-citizens to represent them in Congress are worthy men, and when we disparage them we disparage the citizens who elected them. The first great battles are not fought out with sword and cannon, but with tongue and pen in legislative assembly. The civilized world knew Spain was doomed long before Commodore Dewey's guns spoke in Manila Harbor. When on June 13, 1898, Congress authorized the Secretary of the United States Treasury to issue $400,000,000 worth of bonds for national defense, all the ultimate outcome of the Spanish-American war was decided, except how the treaty of peace should be signed. The outcome of the terrific conflict of 1861 to 1865 would never have been the maintenance of the Union, if Congress had not loyally supported President Lincoln during that eventful period. Aye, there were giants in those days. But the giants upon Capitol Hill, whose moral courage and unswerving loyalty were tried and proved, deserve our honor as much as do the giants fighting at the front.

Legislative Services

Place side by side if you will, those two master personalities, John Sherman and William T. Sherman. They were brothers. They were both geniuses. As we look over the pages of history, it is a very debatable question which should be honored the most and who did the most valiant service for his country: John or William. One was a giant in guiding and creating patriotic legislation, the other a giant in military strategy. Yet to-day, in almost every city you can see fifty pictures of William T. Sherman, where you will find one of his patriotic brother, who was Senator of the United States from 1861 to 1877. The vital importance of the work done by our national legislators, can never be better illustrated than in the life of James A. Garfield. He was one of the most brilliant volunteer soldiers of the war. From the presidential chair of Hiram College, in 1861, he stepped into the military camp and donned a soldier's uniform. Within two years, he wore the shoulder-straps of a major-general. Yet Abraham Lincoln placed his hand upon the brilliant chief of Rosecrans' staff and said: "Garfield, I need you more in Congress than I do in the field. Resign your soldier's commission, and as a Congressman, come and help me." Thus to-day I not only honor the soldier, but also the legislator. I honor James A. Garfield, the general; I also honor James A. Garfield, the Ohio Congressman. In both positions, he did valuable and heroic service.

On this Memorial Day, the brother who stayed at home and worked the farm should be praised as well as the young man who went to the front, and was mentioned for a heroic deed in the commander's dispatch. The young man who sank his personality in the more common but equally needful duties of home life, might have been even braver and more unselfish than the soldier boy who marched down the main street of his native town or city, keeping step to the strains of martial music, and whose train pulled out of his home depot amid the shouts and the huzzas of admiring friends, who came to bid him good-bye.

The Hero at Home

Let me illustrate what I mean by praising the boy who stayed at home to work the farm. Some time ago I was attending a soldiers' reunion. It was a most impressive spectacle, that assembly of aged men. Yes, the ranks of the old soldiers are thinning very rapidly. We shall not have them with us long. But though those veterans were very old when they began to tell their camp-fire stories, as their narrative proceeded they seemed to become boys again. Among the stories told was one I shall never forget. "Did you have any brothers in the army?" I asked an aged soldier. "Yes, one," was the answer. "There were three boys of us. We all wanted to go, but father and mother were getting old, and some one had to stay at home and look after the old folks and our younger sisters. So one night we had a family convocation. After the family talk, we three sons and mother and father decided that two of us boys could go to the war, but that one should stay at home and work the farm. Who were to go? Who was to stay at home? We all wanted to go a fight and so we decided to draw lots. Mother held the book and put in the three slips of paper with marked, 'Stay at home.' We drew. John and myself went to the front, Harry stayed at home." "Did you brother regret that he had to stay?" "Oh, yes. But some one had to stay, and so he simply swallowed his disappointment. Yes, we two boys could never have gone to the front but for Harry's faithfulness to the old folks." Was he not just as patriotic as the two who went forth to battle? Let us, then, place a flower on his grave, as well as upon the graves of those who went to the war. Let us realize that the stay-at-homes sometimes evinced greater moral courage, made more heroic self-sacrifice, and endured greater disappointments than the ones who went to the front.

Patriotism in Civil Life

In this Memorial address, we would accord praise to all who did the country service—the contractors who furnished the blankets and the shoes and the tents and the food and the guns; the patriotic bankers; the railroad men, like Thomas Alexander Scott, who did such valuable service in rushing the troops to their ultimate destinations. We would praise the newspaper editor who moulded public opinion, so that the right men were elected to Congress; and the newspaper reporter who risked life and limb to carry back the news from the front, of what husbands and fathers and brothers had suffered under the tornadoes of shot and shell in the last battle. We would praise such men as James K. McClure of the Philadelphia Press, with whom Lincoln was in closest contact; and Joseph Medill, of the Chicago Tribune, and James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald. These men never were able to wear a Grand Army button. They could tell no camp-fire stories at the Grand Army Reunions; but they had their part in the great struggle. But for their enterprise, their daring and their patriotic devotion, we should never have had the records of valor which are now our priceless possession.

It is a very grave question whether Abraham Lincoln could not better have parted with almost any one of his Major-Generals, than he could have lost that genius of railroad organizing, Thomas Alexander Scott. It is a very grave question whether U. S. Grant would not have been deposed from his command and sent back home in disgrace, had it not been for Charles A. Dana who, as the personal representative of Lincoln, went to the front, and exposed and denounced the false scandal which were being circulated about the "Silent Warrior" of the West. It is a very grave question whether Salmon P. Chase could have ever successfully financed the United States bonds which paid the running expenses of the war government, costing at that time millions upon millions of dollars each month, unless he had been backed up by Jay Cooke, the Philadelphia capitalist, who was to Lincoln what Robert Morris was to George Washington in the Revolution. So to-day I impartially praise the patriotic soldier, the patriotic railroad man, the patriotic editor, the patriotic financier, the patriotic contractor; McClure and Dana and Scott and Jay Cooke, as well as Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Lee and Longstreet and John B. Gordon.

Heaven-Sent Comforters

In this Memorial Day address, we would not omit the need of recognition due to the ministers of the home churches, as well as the chaplains who labored in the field hospital and by the wounded and moaning men who had the pallor of death upon their cheeks the night after the battle. We would praise men like Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn, and Moses D. Hoge, of Richmond, and Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans. These men were never identified with any one particular regiment or brigade, yet in their utterances of inspiration; in the divine comfort which they carried to the bereft homes; in their words of faith and love, which, through the printed page, went to the boys in the camp, they became mighty evangelists of light, mighty Gospel messengers for God and their native land.

We have all read about the noble services of Dwight L. Moody to the soldier boys at the front. We know that many a dying soldier boy was able to answer "Here" to the roll-call of heaven, because some faithful chaplain on earth had prepared him for that "Fall in" on the other side of the grave. We know that many and many a dying message sent to the mother, or the wife at home, was penned by the faithful chaplains who looked after the boys of their regiments, as a father might care for the children about his own fireside. But

What about that gray-haired old minister of the village church? Did he not serve any patriotic purpose? Did he not lift high the standard of the patriotic soldier, when he delivered the eulogy over the casket enwrapped in its country's flag? Did not Moses D. Hoge perform a valiant and a noble service to his land, when he delivered in Richmond the address over the body of that whirlwind of military marvels "Stonewall" Jackson? Ah, yes, the minister of the village church had his mission in the war, as well as the soldiers at the front.

We cannot to-day too much praise the work of the Gospel minister during the agonies of America's four years of carnage. One day a man applied to General Jackson for a position in his army, "What is your business?" asked Jackson, "I am a minister of the Gospel," was the reply. Then Jackson, the Christian soldier, said: "My friend, I can give you no position as high as that which God has given to you. Go back to your own church. In the name of Jesus Christ, give comfort to the widows whose husbands have been shot; to the children, whose fathers, on account of this bloody war, will never come back; to the young maidens, who can never again see their sweethearts. Go back, and preach the Gospel of sacrifice to the young men, who must be enlisted from your town. Go back! In God's name, go back!" Ay, the duty which Thomas J. Jackson assigned to the ministers of Jesus, was grandly and nobly fulfilled by hundreds of consecrated clergymen, both in the North and the South. To-day I honor the memories of the noble men of God, who at home were true and firm to their Lord and their people during the awful conflict.

But I have still another long list of unpraised heroes. I would not praise the Boy in Blue or the Boy in Gray for what he did in 1861 and 1865, more than I would praise him for what he did after peace had been proclaimed. It was a spectacle that astonished the world, a spectacle unprecedented in history, that of the soldiers of those two huge armies laying down their muskets and taking up the ploughshare. To their honor be it said that they were ready to turn their backs upon strife and, side by side, work together in the vocations of peace. The vast armies of America going forth to battle is not nearly as impressive, from a historic standpoint, to the student of sociology, as those armies almost instantly melting away and then and there their ex-members fraternizing with one another, and striving to the uttermost to build up the country with as much earnestness as they had shown in fighting each other to the death.

Without any doubt, Robert E. Lee was one of the finest characters America ever produced. Would you like to know what was to me the greatest act of that grand life? I find it not in his actions before the war. I find it not in his wonderful equipoise and gentleness and marvelous powers during the war. But after Appomattox the chief nobility of that life glowed before his fellow-countrymen as a single star might out-shine all the other stars in the heavenly firmament. After the war was over, a rich financial company of New York City, in order to catch the Southern trade through Robert E. Lee's popularity, offered Lee $25,000 per year as a salary to become its manager. What said General Lee. "No, I cannot come. I must stay among my own people to help teach them to become true Christian citizens, to help teach them how to have faith in their God, and patriotic love for their whole land." Robert E. Lee turned his back at that time, upon the most princely salary then offered in the City of New York. In order to teach his people to love a reunited country, and to have faith in God, he accepted an humble position as the president of one of Virginia's bankrupt schools. Rather than live for mercenary gain, he quietly and yet nobly and unselfishly went to live among the shattered walls of Washington College, in Lexington. He lived there until the close of his life. Some people may tell you that the greatest service the American soldier did for his country was when he suffered upon the field of battle. I tell you that the greatest service the Confederate Army and the Federal Army ever did for their native land was when they dissolved, and when their Christian soldiers became the earnest, consecrated advocates of Christian peace. So to-day I praise no less highly than the soldier who went out in 1861 to fight his country's battles, the soldier in 1866 returning to civil life, and striving in home, and factory, and store, to heal the wounds of the nation, and reunite its people in the bonds of Christian love.

Sometime ago I stood on the top of the Washington Monument, and looked off upon the battlefields of America, and dreamed my dreams. I saw hundreds of thousands of human bones bleaching in the sunlight, gnawed of the vulture and the wolf. I heard the muffled drums beating the tattoo at sunset. As the artillery wagons rumbled away to the rear, and star twinkled to star, I heard sentinel by the glare of the camp fire call to sentinel: "All's well. All's well along the Potomac!"

There goes the booming of the cannon, and the sharp commands of the officers: "Steady, boys, steady, steady!" There is the ping of the bullet, and the dying soldier clutches at his heart as he moans: "My babies, O God, my poor babies!" and then drops dead. There comes the blood-curdling Confederate cry: "Hi! Hi! Hi! Hi!" There is the long line of set faces, behind the glittering bayonets. The heavens redden and glow. The flames leap, and hiss, and dance, and make merry over the burning homes. The falling beams go crash, crash, crash! The rivers are deep with flowing blood; the grave trenches are filled with a million dead.

As I turn and look upon the great white dome of the Capitol, the old national flag flaps and waves. Its stars glitter like the eyes of the mothers waiting for their boys who never came back, and like the eyes of the maidens, who, after a while as old women, read and reread the torn and the yellow letters which their heroes just before the fatal battle, wrote about the bridal homes which were destined never to be built. And as I look upon the old flag again, the white stripes look like the white bandages which were put about the shattered arms. The long, deep streaks of red prove that its folds had once been dipped into pools of human blood. Then the great white dome of the legislative hall, glistening in the sunlight, looks as though it were builded out of the broken tombstones of Arlington Heights and Gettysburg and the Wilderness.

Then as I look up and down the great Pennsylvania avenue, I seem to see the united armies of the Boys in Blue and of the Boys in Gray, marching, marching, marching. I see the lines melt away. Following with my eye one soldier, I see him take his discharge, and he starts for home. I cannot tell whether this discharged soldier is now heading for the Michigan hills, or for the Georgia plantations; in his civilian dress he has no distinctive insignia, telling me whether he fought under Grant or under Lee. Then I see this soldier coming up to the farm-gate and being welcomed home by his dear ones. Now his wife nearly faints away for joy. Then, in the evening hour, I see him gather the little children about him. He opens the Old Book. He reads a chapter. The family kneel in prayer. Then the lights are put out, and I know the war is forever ended.

The Christian soldier of conflict has become the Christian citizen of patriotic peace. So on this Memorial Day, with its sad and happy associations, while we praise the soldier boy of 1861, let us also honor the Christian veteran of the time of peace. Let us, with the memory of what he has done in both conflicts, go forth to one last great battle. Let us take the Bible in hand and capture this round world for Christ.

Come, ye Christian heroes of the past, both praised and unpraised. Come with your sacred memories and your buried dead. Come, ye Christian heroes of the future, with your cradles and unborn generations. Come, ye nations about to be born for Christ. Come all times and all millenniums. Down in prayer and kneel to Him, who, will yet be crowned King of kings and Lord of all. Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

CAN WE SAY "NO" TO THEM?

THE time will soon be here when the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson, will be opened for the waiting throng. Such eagerness as is theirs! Such anticipations of the good time coming! As soon as a bud bursts on the trees in the city parks, and the grass shows a bit of green, then visions of Mont-Lawn begin to fill the little one's waking hours, and to haunt their dreams.

Some of the children never saw a tree until they were taken, by the kindness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, up the sparkling Hudson, to that beautiful home amid Rockland's hills.

There are localities in New York where no vegetation exists, except, perhaps a sickly geranium in a tenement-house window, and when a child who has been brought up, or rather who has come up, amid the nature and admonition of New York's worst streets, no wonder its eyes open wide with wonderment, which soon turns to the keenest joy at the sight of the real country.

One little boy had reached the mature age of nine years, before he ever saw a tree of any kind; he had never been but a few blocks away from the squalid tenement in which he was born. He was a puny mite, and his hard-working mother had watched him as best she could, in the intervals of her daily toil. When he first saw the country and all its beauties, he seemed lost in wonderment, and exclaimed as he gazed at the trees, "O, the beautiful, beautiful, big green flowers!"

Until one has penetrated the dreadful mystery of how twenty families, that number at least fifty children among them, can live in a twenty-five-foot front house, there can be no just comprehension of how necessary such homes as Mont-Lawn are to the very lives of these children.

Driven, by over-crowding and terrible heat, to the street, they find a little relief, but the pavements are hard and hot to the little bare feet, and if in their play they venture from curb to curb, the children are in constant danger from the heavy trucks and other vehicles, which make an endless procession through the crowded streets of down-town. Many a little cripple is hobbling around, or on a doorstep sitting gazing with piteous eyes at its more fortunate companions, who daily escape a like fate by the strength of a brawny driver's wrist, as he turns aside his horses. But danger or no danger, there they are, these children of the streets, exposed oftentimes to worse perils than trolley or teams. For lessons of wickedness there is no better schoolroom than city streets, and no more able teachers than larger boys and girls, who, by precept and example, lead the smaller ones astray. Restless little creatures they are—what child is not restless—if unoccupied? They must do something, and if nothing good presents itself, naturally they turn to the bad. It is from such influences, such environment, that Mont-Lawn receives many children, and during their ten days' stay in this home they learn, for the first time in many instances, what joy there is in being clean, and the influences that are brought to bear upon them, the efforts to teach them cleanliness within as well as without, are such as to give a right trend to their future lives. The new life that is opened up to them when they visit Mont-Lawn, not only fills the present with such happiness as they in their blighted little lives never dreamed of, but it gives them a hope for the future, something to live for. These children are sure that the kind people who sent them once, will send them again, and oftentimes this thought is all that reconciles them to bidding good-bye to the "big green flowers" and their kind caretakers. Three dollars gives a little child a ten days' outing.

Shall they be disappointed this year? Shall hundreds of other little ones, who have never yet known the comfort of a clean bed, who have never in their short lives had enough to eat, or felt the contact of clean, whole garments with their little bodies, whose small feet never trod anything softer or cleaner than the pavement of New York's slums, or the blackened stairs of their tenement homes, shall they be denied this beautiful visit to Mont-Lawn, which means so much to them and their poor, tired mothers? Twenty-one dollars pays for a bed for the season. It costs so little, and means so much. Can we say "No"?

Pilgrims Gather in Jerusalem

The World's Sunday School Convention Delegates Tent in Holy Land

By MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

ALL roads lead to Jerusalem, at least all roads in Palestine do. At Beyrout, the Grosser Kurfurst party was divided in several sections to proceed to Jerusalem by many different routes, and meet there in time for the great World's Sunday School Convention. One party of one hundred and four went to Damascus by rail, and then on horseback from Damascus to Jerusalem. Another party of two hundred and more went by steamer to Haifa, Mt. Carmel, then by horseback through Galilee and Samaria to Jerusalem. Three other parties, numbering one hundred and fifty each, went by carriage from Haifa to Nazareth, to Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, and returning took the steamer at Haifa for Joppa; from Joppa, several parties went by rail to Jerusalem. Still others went by carriage across the great plain of Sharon to Jerusalem.

An aged member of the cruise (whom we shall call "Veritas") betook himself to Jerusalem several days in advance, that he might witness the arrival of the several parties. The railway brought the first company. They had almost two weeks to spend in Jerusalem before the Convention. The second party to arrive, a week later (one of the parties who had been to Nazareth and Galilee), told Veritas about having had to wait a day outside of Joppa for a quiet sea in which to be taken from the Grosser Kurfurst in small boats. They had come by carriage from Joppa to Jerusalem, across the plain of Sharon, through the Valley of Ajalon, and over the Judean hills, stopping at Gezer, to view the wonderful excavations being made there by the Palestine Exploration Society. They had read their Bibles along the way, as they were passing the places where Samson had tied the firebrands to the foxes' tails; where Joshua had commanded the sun to stand still; where the Philistines had brought the ark into the temple of their god Dagon; at Kirjath-Jearim where the ark rested in the home of Obed-Edom. They told Veritas of the walls, and pillars, and the great cistern of Gezer, a city brought by the bride of Solomon as her dowry, the gift of her father, one of the Pharaohs, a city only recently uncovered, and still being excavated, and which was in existence four thousand years ago. The visitors were surprised to see women carrying the dirt in baskets on their heads out of the excavations, up long flights of stairs and over a hill. These women receive but sixpence a day for their work; but it is considered good pay, as it costs but one penny a day to live.

The next party to arrive had much to tell Veritas about their visit in Nazareth, how almost the whole city had come out to meet them, asking for bakshish. They told how they had been lodged in the monastery, carried on by Franciscan monks; had large bottles of wine; had them placed on the tables, free, of course, but left untouched by the Sunday School party. They told of their visits to the reputed house where Mary and Joseph lived, to the Mount of Precipitation and the Church of the Annunciation. But they were most enthusiastic in telling of the wonderful views they had of the surrounding country from the hill-tops around Nazareth; the Mediterranean on one side and Mt. Hermon in the distance, with Mt. Tabor and the Valley of Esdraelon between, the outlines of the hills of Samaria, with the villages of Endor, Nain, etc., dotting the hillsides, and the mountains of Moab in sight. The children of Nazareth had a peculiar interest to them, and as they nearly all wore coats of many colors, and red boots, when not barefooted, it was easy to think how Jesus must have looked as a child. A little girl, not over six years of age, was seen leading two heavily-laden camels through the streets of Nazareth just about dark. In reply to a question asked by one of their number as to what the people of Nazareth think to-day about Jesus, they were told that they thought Jesus regarded them with unusual affection, and gave them his special care, because they were of his own city. Nazareth is to-day a Christian city, three-fourths of the people being worshippers of the true God; in this estimate were included the members of Greek and Latin Churches and Mohammedans. There is not a Jew in Nazareth to-day.

The next company to arrive in Jerusalem, was one returning from Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee. In the evening, little children with handfuls of the tiny shells, which they had gathered on the shores of Galilee, found their way among the guests of the monastery and the hotel. Some of the primary teachers of our party bought them to take home to their little scholars. One of our company asked a bright Arab lad of nine years, if he knew what Jesus had ever done on the Sea of Galilee? In broken, but musical English, he told the story of Jesus stilling the storm. His rendering of Jesus' words: "O ye of little faith," was: "Why are you not a Christian? You are not Christian at all!" It was a graphic description, to say the least. The boy was a pupil in the Scotch mission.

The next party came into Jerusalem in two sections, riding on horses and looking very much sunburned and dust-covered. They had been more than seven days in the saddle. They greeted Veritas as an old friend. "Have you had a grand time?" he asked. "Oh, yes," they replied, "but one of the hardest trips in Palestine, needing to be out of our tents almost by daylight, and in the saddle all day, much of the way being between mountains, over rocky places." "Where did you be with the gentlemen in the rear. They quickly made their way to their familiar tents already set up in Jerusalem, just outside the Damascus gate.

Old Jerusalem seemed now to take on a new life. The streets were filled with friends greeting each other who had not met since leaving the Grosser Kurfurst at Beyrout. And the English contingent, four hundred and eighty strong, had arrived. We could not call each other by name, but we exchanged Christian greetings. And there were fourteen hundred other pilgrims mostly in Russian garb, who had journeyed from afar to observe the Greek Easter in Jerusalem. Their weird songs filled the early morning hours, as they passed through the streets from shrine to shrine.

The "green hill" is no longer far away. Our great Convention tent is spread close beside it, in the very spot where, eight hundred years ago, was the camp of the German crusaders, and there they sang their hymn "Fairest Lord Jesus." We are told that permission to put up the tent had to be gained of Nayzim Bey, the Governor of Jerusalem. It will seat fifteen hundred people. A closer view of it reveals that the entrance is guarded by a company of Turkish soldiers. The interior is decorated with large flags of all nations. The platform is covered with rich Turkish rugs. A string of lanterns, large ones hang through the middle of the tent from end to end. They are to be the only means of illumination. The seating has evidently been made for the occasion, comfortable pine settees. A piano is in place in front of the platform. The tent is far removed from the several hotels and we must pass along the road, over which caravans of camels are continually passing, to reach it. But our zeal in the cause in which we have enlisted acknowledges no difficulties, and through dust and heat we will make our way four times a day to and from that self-same tent, which shall be to us as the tent where Moses of old met God face to face. We wait the signal for our assembling.

The Convention was scheduled to begin on Monday, April 18, but it really began on Sunday, April 17. Indeed, those who attended a sunrise prayer meeting on that day on Mt. Olivet, felt that the wheels of the Convention had begun to turn, and that the spirit of God was within the wheels. To be there required that one should be well on the way about as soon as it began to dawn. The garden tomb, the true holy sepulchre, was by the road-side. A Christian woman passing alone by that way, met two women of another faith, probably the Greek Church. They could not speak each other's language, but they made the sign of the cross, and put their arms around each other, and walked on together until they came to a church close beside the Garden of Gethsemane. The two women went in, and the other started alone up Mt. Olivet, but was joined by another woman, who established her kinship by making the sign of the cross.

The sunrise prayer meeting was held, and a glorious Amen of blessing came down from above, in the sweet chime of bells in the Tower of the Ascension. Later a large audience gathered in the tent to hear the Convention sermon, preached by the venerable Archdeacon of London, Rev. William Sinclair. His text was Matt. 21: 15, 16.

At four o'clock in the afternoon there was a communion service in the Convention tent, Dr. John Potts presiding. Before the bread was passed, Dr. Potts requested that it be retained in the hand of each person until all had received it, and then that we should all partake of it at the same moment. This we did, and the unfermented wine was passed, and we all drank of it. After a few words of prayer we went quietly out of the tent.

The evening, at 7.30, found us again in the tent. Mr. F. F. Belsey, president of the Third World's Convention, presiding. An address of welcome was made by Rev. G. F. Blyth, D.D., bishop of the Church of England for Jerusalem and the East. A man of many years, and lovely in presence, with a well modulated voice, he seemed to embody the ideal bishop.

My next letter will give the actual work of the Convention.

PILGRIMS ABOUT TO RIDE AROUND THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM

gin your journey?" asked Veritas. "We took horses at Haifa, stopped first at Nazareth, and then at Tiberias, dwelling in beautiful tents, white on the outside, and lined with the gayest of Egyptian tapestry. The camp equipage was carried by pack mules, and at the end of each day's journey we found the tents set up, and dinner ready to be served in table d'hôte style. Breakfast was also served in the tent, but we had a cold lunch by the way.

"There was a general exclamation of admiration when the Valley of Esdraelon burst upon our view," they added. "So velvety green was it, from end to end, it seemed to be the most fertile spot on earth. No wonder, for has it not been one of the greatest battlefields of the World? Some of us as we rode along, read in our Bibles about the time when Deborah prayed upon the height, while Barak charged down the mountain with ten thousand Israelites to meet Sisera and his hosts. At the Mount of Beatitudes, some of our party climbed to the top and read aloud the 'Sermon on the Mount.' At Jacob's Well, we read the story of Jesus meeting the woman of Samaria. On the slopes of Ebal and Gerizim, we read about Israel being gathered there first by Moses and then by Joshua. We were shown the Samaritan Pentateuch by the Samaritan high priest himself, and we knew that we were looking at the oldest manuscript of the Bible in the World. We were glad when the high priest told us it was his intention to be present at the World's Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem."

The next party to arrive was one which had come overland from Damascus. They came, one hundred and four strong, with the eight ladies of the party riding first, followed by a picturesque company of dragomen,

A LIGHT IN WESTERN ASIA

The Bible House in Constantinople and its Great Gospel and Educational Work -- A Field in which All May Aid

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done and is doing royal service in feeding, clothing and sheltering the victims of massacre and famine in Eastern lands. The bereaved, the despairing, the orphan waifs, receive also food for their minds and their souls, at the hands of their benefactors.

But there are millions upon millions in those dark lands, whose bodies are not naked or shelterless, or unfed, but whose minds are starving for wholesome food, whose souls thirst for living water. In many portions of Asia the pall of dense ignorance is unlifted, while in Western Asia, on the seaboard, and in centres of provinces, the veriest garbage of the press of Latin Europe, has become, through translations into the native languages of lands bordering on the Mediterranean, the intellectual and moral pabulum of newly awakened Oriental minds. It is the endeavor of the American Mission Press at Constantinople, to furnish an antidote to this poison.

To a few thousands of youths gathered into the higher schools founded by American missionaries, the fountain of English undefiled has been opened, and these may drink and live. But for the masses of Oriental peoples, it is chiefly through the Press and through their own vernaculars that they are to be supplied, if supplied at all, with wholesome intellectual and spiritual food. That an appetite for knowledge exists, let such facts as these bear witness:

THE LATE REV. ELIAS RIGGS,

lad, whose mother was blind, whose father was sick with an incurable disease, into whose poor hut of a home the winter snows were drifting, was so eager to learn that he came to school in the bitter cold, without stockings, an old coat four sizes too large, serving for coat, vest and shirt, bringing in his hands as far as the school door, so they might last long to wear when he was with the other boys, the only apology for shoes he had. That lad stuck to it till he became a teacher and preacher.

On one of the hills near Mosul, the hottest part of Turkey, in a tribe of Arab-Koords, lived a tall, black-eyed lad, a hairy Esau as he grew up, who, to learn something, while his mates were content to watch the sheep, went to an adjoining tribe to be a pupil of a famous Khodja. His total outfit was one long, coarse cotton shirt. "What did you do when this became soiled?" I asked. "Washed it in the river, hung it on a bush, and stayed in the water till it was dry." His bed was the ground; his covering the starry sky; his food dry bread, with sometimes half a cucumber. But he mastered all of Arabic learning, sacred and secular. One day he found the binding of an Arabic Bible, thrown away by the person who destroyed the book. He could not rest till he had found in Mosul an entire copy of the Bible. This he read with absorbing interest. He found a Philip--Deacon Micah, of the Evangelical Church in Mosul, who helped him understand what he read. He became a sincere Christian. From 1873 to 1878 he assisted, at Constantinople, in the translation of the Bible into Turkish. His thorough knowledge of Arabic was of great value in the work. In

By Rev. G. F. Herrick, D.D.

REV. GEO. F. HERRICK, D.D.

THE BIBLE HOUSE, OLD STAMBOUL, CONSTANTINOPLE

1880 he was ushered into the unclouded light of the Celestial City.

"I am reading your Natural Theology for the fifth time," said the Circassian Governor of an interior city to me some time ago.

"You have done our people a great service in giving us that book on Physical Geography," said a high Turkish officer to the translator of the book.

"I want to meet the author of Belief and Worship"--a book, in Turkish, in explanation of Evangelical Christianity--said an Albanian scribe to his Christian neighbor.

Here are six nationalities that must look to us for wholesome intellectual, moral and religious nourishment. Turks, as well as others, buy and read the Bible and our other books in the language of their race. Missionaries translate the Bible into all languages and the Bible societies bear the expense. But all else that constitutes a Christian literature is the work of the publication department of the missions.

From our Press at Constantinople we have published three weekly newspapers, one monthly paper. Sunday School lesson books, hymn and tune books, school books, commentaries, scientific books and numerous tracts.

The issues of our Press have, up till the straitened conditions of the last two years, averaged about ten million pages a year. Our four periodicals reach ten thousand readers. Our Sunday School lesson books are read by twenty thousand souls. Twenty-three thousand pupils in our schools look to us for school-books. Besides distinctively religious books, we have the golden opportunity to introduce the Turks, as well as other peoples, to the best things of Western thought and life. But our present resources do not enable us to sustain the initial cost of the preparation and printing of the books and putting them on the market.

By reason of the great diminution of the yearly grants from the American Board, whose work is rapidly expanding in every field, our resources are so reduced that a score of valuable and necessary books, some of them already in manuscript, a concordance of the Bible in Armenian, one in Turkish, an astronomy, etc., await means for printing.

More serious still, our position of vast influence over all races of the Ottoman Empire is imperilled by the necessity we are under--from lack of funds--since 1899, of issuing only our newspapers, tracts and Sunday School lesson books.

Twelve thousand dollars in hand before December 31, 1905, in addition to our present resources, would set us on our feet again, would let us reprint valuable and salable books, especially certain school-books not found elsewhere, whose stock is exhausted, and print the new books in process of preparation. This is a case of as real and urgent, if not so startling, an appeal, as those cases of massacre and famine to which so noble a response has been made.

Of our existing resources, fully one half comes from native sources, in receipts from sale of books and subscriptions to our periodicals.

I expect to return to my post next September, but time of payment of gifts may be extended to November, 1905.

Saved from Sin by a Song

REV. E. S. UFFORD, author of many Gospel hymns, recently made a tour of the world, visiting many prominent cities, where he preached and sang the story of God's love to men. To render his famous song, "The Life-Line," more effective, he carried with him a miniature life-saving station, with the mortar, life-line, life-buoy, hawser, torch, and megaphone, from which he drew helpful lessons in moral heroism. In one city he met an editor of a daily journal, who related the following incident:

"I shall never forget the first time I heard your song. I, with several young men, was a member of a club, called 'The Forest Club.' We hired a room, and used to meet there nights and play cards. On Sundays we would contribute enough for a keg of ale. It so happened that a certain minister had felt it his duty to start a mission in a room in the same block, and opposite the room where our club met.

EDITORS AND TRANSLATORS, BIBLE HOUSE, CONSTANTINOPLE

As we were playing cards and drinking, one day, we were startled by a lady's voice ringing out from the room opposite, 'Throw Out the Life-Line!' One of our number opposite me seemed deeply affected. He threw down the cards and said, 'Boys, if they are right then we are wrong.' I said, 'That's so; there's no telling where we may bring up if we continue in this thing.' I remember how we agreed to disband, and in a few days the Forest Club was a thing of the past."

Science's Last Word

THAT distinguished men of science may err, and err in a way that must shake popular confidence in "Science's last word," which we so frequently hear about in connection with the war on revelation, was made apparent in a very remarkable manner in London lately. Before a brilliant audience, which included such eminent men as Lord Kelvin, Lord Rayleigh and Professor Dewar, Professor Rutherford, one of the ablest living scientists, propounded a new theory of the earth's heat, which upset in a moment all the pre-conceived theories of the wise men he was addressing.

He declared with great force and earnestness, that his recent investigations had led him to conclude that the source of the earth's heat is radium; that radium is contained in all matter, and that the famous and widely accepted calculation of Lord Kelvin that the earth, being originally a molten mass, had been cooling down to its present temperature at least one hundred million years, was therefore inadmissible, as according to the new theory of radium heat, the temperature would have been subject to little variation during countless ages—indeed, as the heat-giving power of radium is practically inexhaustible, the temperature of the earth would have changed very little since the beginning. It follows, according to Professor Rutherford, that human life may have existed on our planet during all that time, the conditions making the globe habitable for man.

This is "science's last word." If the scientific world accepts the new theory of the earth's heat—and it seems not unlikely that it will—all the hitherto accepted "facts of science" regarding the globe's origin and development may be discarded as worthless. It may mean a reconstruction of the systems and methods for which biologists and geologists have been laboring, and for the establishment of which they have vigorously contended. It is a rude shock which Professor Rutherford has administered to those who have believed that science cannot err, and who now realize that they know very little about the age and growth of the world after all.

Methodist Standards

THERE is reason to hope that the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now in session at Los Angeles, will adopt the report of the committee which has been considering the proposed change in the rule on amusements. That committee advises that the rule prohibiting members of the church indulging in dancing, card-playing, and theatre-going, be maintained without change.

It must be admitted that there is force in the argument of those who desire to see the rule relaxed, that the enforcement of the rule causes many young people to unite with other churches, which have no such rule, who might otherwise unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Unquestionably there is loss, or, at least, failure to gain. It may, however, be well to consider whether the acquisition of persons who desire to indulge in those amusements would be a real gain to the church. The strength of a church cannot be estimated merely by numbers. Account must be taken of quality as well as quantity. When a new member is received, it is expected that he will be ready to work for the Master whose service he thus enters. If his time is occupied with such amusements as the rule prohibits, and if, as usually happens, the mind dwells upon them, it is not probable that much Christian service will be rendered. To a considerable extent, new recruits of that class would have to be treated as "non-effectives." The ministers and leaders could not rely upon them for church work. Besides this, their example might influence other members, and so the aggressive, devoted spirit which has hitherto characterized the Methodist Church might be relaxed.

That many other churches are more liberal in their policy is admitted, but it has always been so. The Methodist Church had its origin in a recognition of such facts. Its fundamental principle was obedience to the Apostolic injunction: "Come out from among them and be ye separate and touch not the unclean thing." There has been a glory about that church in its standing for separation from the world, and in the machinery and organization that it had for promoting and maintaining that separation. It has stood for purity, for holiness of life and for consistency of conduct. Its members have been noted for having other pleasures, other motives and other ideals than are to be found in worldly resorts. To admit now, members who must go to the world for recreation, would be a confession of weakness which would deprive Methodism of its unique position. Better far that it should continue to tell those who wish to enter its fold, that none are welcome there but those who have renounced the world with its pleasures, and have made full surrender to Christ.

A Remarkable Symposium

IN the very large number of letters that have been received from the readers of this journal in response to our invitation for a solution of the great and urgent problem: "How shall we deal with the deserving poor?" there are contributions of such marked ability that our statesmen and legislators might peruse them with profit. Taken as a whole, the letters must be accepted as conclusive evidence that the question is one which has been well considered in all its essential features by a majority of the writers. While there is naturally great variety in the remedies suggested, it is clear that the three prominent points of the problem have been kept steadily in view, viz: 1. That the remedy must be a practical one, applicable to masses as well as to individuals; 2, that it must not involve the pauperizing of the poor, but must be such as will work out toward self-support and preserve and increase the spirit of independence and self-respect, and 3, that it should ultimately lead to the breaking up of the abnormal congestion which now prevails in nearly all of our large cities, by removing the deserving poor to more favorable localities, where land is abundant and cheap, and where their labor, intelligently directed, would bring a sure reward.

There are many suggestions offered, showing how this may be accomplished, but not all are equally practical. In a purely paternal government, the problem would probably be solved by furnishing state or national employment for great masses of the industrious poor, in the construction of public improvements, the making of highways, the clearing and draining of waste lands, and like enterprises. In former ages, this was the policy followed in many countries; but it resulted in demoralization, widespread abuses, coolie-ism and semi-slavery. Co-operation between capital and labor, on a large scale and on a profit-sharing basis, might open up vast tracts of territory that are now lying idle, and make them valuable. The Salvation Army colonies contain the germ of an idea which, if carried out with the State or National aid, might go very far toward solving the difficulty. Endowment funds, to be adequate for the extensive need, would drain the national treasury dry. Appeals to individual philanthropy would probably be futile; for unless the heart and soul of the rich are touched with the spirit of Christ, such a scheme would fail to attract, and would be set down as Utopian and chimerical.

As some of our correspondents have pointed out, the workers themselves, if they combined their forces, might be able to accomplish much toward the uplift of the deserving poor. They must begin with the Christlike spirit of brotherliness, and proceed upon the lines of consecrated common sense, uniting on some practical plan looking to the distribution of the able-bodied unemployed in sections where labor is at a premium. During a large part of every year there is a heavy shortage of labor in many States, to which the unemployed might be profitably transferred. Nearly every mail brings letters from the West and South, calling for help. Men are needed for the fields and the workshops, and women for domestic duties in a multitude of homes. With this unequal balance adjusted, the condition of labor in many localities would be a thousandfold better than now, and poverty would be reduced proportionately.

But, after all—and when every suggested remedy has been duly considered—it must be confessed that there is within humanity's reach no sovereign cure for poverty. It will only be eradicated when sin no longer dominates the lives and actions of men, and when, instead of being selfish, unjust, cruel and indifferent toward their fellow-beings, they come to regard them as brothers and sisters in God's great family. And when that change takes place, this old world of ours will be very near to the millennium.

The New Pastor

IT is not always the easiest thing in the world for the new pastor to become acquainted with his people. He tries as soon as he can to visit every family in the parish, but he often has a feeling when doing so, that they are mentally comparing him with his predecessor, and that, try as hard as he may, he does not penetrate beyond the outer rim of intercourse. Every one is not at once at ease with a minister whom he or she does not know. If the retiring pastor has been popular and beloved, and his going is much lamented, the new comer must prove that he possesses equally amiable qualities, and must win friends for himself.

Woe to the pastor who comes to a church where the pulpit has long been vacant, and the people have grown critical in listening to a great number of different candidates. It will be almost impossible for such a one to at once gain the attention of his people, and vanquish the critical spirit which is hostile to devotion. The warmest of welcomes should surely be given to the new pastor and his family, who very likely have homesick hearts for the friends they have left behind them.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST REV. E. R. HERMISTON, of the Chapel Car Emmanuel, has lately been conducting a series of shop meetings for railroad men, at Los Angeles, the results of which have been very satisfactory.

—NEARLY THREE YEARS ago, Mr. J. E. Brooks, an independent missionary, began work among the Mosquito Indians on Principulca, Nicaragua, C. A. He has officiated at forty marriages and baptized 123 persons. His work needs encouragement and help.

—A GREAT AWAKENING has come to Madera, Calif., through the influence of a union revival conducted by Rev. Tilman Hobson and Prof. R. N. Jeffery, Presbyterian evangelists. One church will double its membership and others will have an increase.

War's Enormous Cost

WHAT the cost of war in actual money may be, is suggested in the picture on this page. It is a view of one of the strong rooms of the Bank of Russia. Stored on the shelves are gold bars, while on the floor, packed in strong boxes, are gold coins. In the gold in that room is worth five hundred million dollars; yet the Imperial Government is fully aware how quickly that vast sum will disappear in the struggle now in progress. It has already ordered the money markets of Europe as a borrower, and asks the smallest sum of one hundred and sixty million dollars. Its present public debt is over three thousand millions, a large portion of which is owing to citizens of France, who will probably also be the chief subscribers to the new loan. Japan also has asked the aid of Europe and America in her emergency. Her public debt is about three hundred million dollars, which is small compared with that of her rival. She is now asking for fifty millions, and this people both here and in England eager to accommodate her. The offers received in London on the first day, amounted to twenty times the sum allotted to England, and in New York the sum offered was considerably more than was asked for. Thus it would appear that if the nations are intent on continuing the costly game of war, they will have no difficulty in borrowing the necessary funds. But it is well to think how their people will have to be taxed, after the war is over, to pay both principal and interest.

Conflicting stories of battles on the Yalu and to the north of that stream continue to be cabled, but the authentic news is small. It is evident, however, that General Kouropatkin is continuing his policy of retreat, apparently with the intention of concentrating at Moukden or Harbin, and are awaiting reinforcements, being hurried to him over the Siberian Railroad. General Kuroki, on his side, is directing his efforts to the isolation of Port Arthur, while incidentally trying to intercept the retreat of Russian troops. The garrisoned port is now apparently surrounded by the Japanese, both by sea and land, and its fall, unless speedy relief is sent, appears inevitable. A report was issued on May 20 that Gen. Kuroki's advanced division of 20,000 men, on the south of Liao-Yang, had been attacked by 32,000 Cossacks, and forced to retreat to Ling-Wang-Cheng.

Two serious marine disasters are reported to have fallen on the Japanese. One of these, was the sinking of the fine battleship Hatsuse, which struck a Russian mine off Port Arthur. It is believed that she had a crew of nearly eight hundred men on board, of whom only three hundred were saved. On the same day (May 15), a second disaster occurred. The Japanese cruiser Kasuga, while running in a fog, struck her sister ship Yoshino, and sent her to the bottom. Only ninety of her crew of three hundred were saved; thus making the loss of life, by the double disaster, about seven hundred men. These losses of men and money in the brutal pursuit of war, are a sad spectacle in this twentieth century, yet neither nation will listen to any offer of mediation. It is a pity that only by experience will they learn how sound is the Apostle's warning:

If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another (Gal. 5:15).

A Physician Prostrated

Devotion to a patient in whose case a well-known physician in New York had become deeply interested, has led to his being prostrated by the disease he tried to cure. It was cerebro-spinal meningitis, which is popularly known as "spotted fever." Many cases of this disease have suddenly developed in the uptown districts of the city, and there is great curiosity among the physicians as to the cause. It is suspected that it is contagious, but that fact is not fully established. One of the patients was a child, and when the doctor was summoned, he determined to watch it closely, as he had already attended several similar cases. He administered the remedies he thought most likely to relieve the sufferer, and remained by the bedside all day and all night. In spite of his efforts, the child died early the following morning, and then the doctor went home. Shortly afterward he felt ill, and recognizing his symptoms as those of the disease he had been treating, he hurried to Bellevue Hospital, where he had formerly been house-surgeon, and where he knew he would have the best attention. He has been tenderly cared for and his case is in the hands of experienced physicians, but it is said at the hospital that his condition is critical. The sad feature of his case, if he should die, would be that he did not save the child after all. Happily in examining it, the man was horrified to see that it was labeled "dynamite." He called a policeman, who questioned the boy, and learned from him that the stick had been taken from a box that had been left near an excavation that was being made for a new sewer. Some careless carter had been instructed to deliver the dynamite to the contractors for the work, and not finding any one to receive it, had deposited it beside the excavation, expecting that the workmen would find it in the morning. Boys, playing around, had become curious about the contents of the box, and had taken the sticks of dynamite to play with. The policeman succeeded in collecting all of them from the children before any mischief was done. The man who left the dangerous stuff where the children could get at it ought to be severely punished. He knew its deadly character, which they did not. The responsibility for moral injury is still more terrible. The man who introduces a child to moral evil, or puts him in the way of temptation incurs a fearful doom.

It were well for him if a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were thrown into the sea, rather than that he should cause one of these little ones to stumble (Luke 17:2).

Kept a Light Shining 47 Years

A woman's long life of faithful service has just come to a close. She was appointed in 1857 lighthouse-keeper at Stony Point Promontory, N. Y., and from that time until the day of her death, she had the charge of the light in the tower. She went to the beacon in 1853 as a young wife, when her husband assumed the duties of lighthouse-keeper. Four years afterward, he sustained injuries in an accident, from which he died in the course of a few weeks. The widow convinced the Lighthouse Board that she could perform the duties connected with the station, and she was appointed successor to her husband. Her life afterward for nearly half a century was spent on the same spot. She filled the lamps, prepared the wicks, and polished the lenses, and in foggy weather wound up the mechanism which kept a fog-bell ringing. She was very methodical in her work, and the Government inspector could always see from her books the exact minute when on any night the lamps were lighted, and when they were extinguished. During the day, she cultivated a plot of land near the lighthouse, but never once did she fail at the proper time to have the beacon shedding its warning light. Would that every Christian had such a record as to the light he is expected to give!

Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men who wait for their lord (Luke 12:35).

BRIEF NOTES

A league has been formed in England to maintain family worship. Its president is Rev. F. B. Meyer.

The Newton Theological Institution (Baptist) has voted that seventy-two years shall be the limit of active service in the faculty.

The office of the American Bible League, the first convention of which was held recently in New York, is at 82 Bible House, New York.

Dr. Alex. Dowie is reported to have directed that preparation be made for a campaign in Utah, which will be commenced soon after his return from Australia.

Prof. Goldwin Smith has addressed a letter to Mr. Andrew Carnegie giving him the wise advice, to devote any more money he may decide on spending in public benefactions, to relieving the misery in the homes of the poor, instead of spending it in founding libraries.

The oldest newspaper in Japan, exhorting the people to regard Russian captives kindly and to harbor generous feelings toward their enemy, says: "Revenge is a sin; it is a barbarous act! An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth belongs to an old law which is obsolete. We are living under a new law of universal brotherhood and love." If Japan be really a heathen nation we may greet such an expression with the words, "Thou art not far from the Kingdom of God."

METHODISTS IN CONFERENCE

TWO of the most important matters on the programme of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church have already been considered, and practically decided. The first of these is the retirement of Bishops, and the election of their successors, and the second, the proposal to qualify or repeal the rule relating to amusements.

Dr. Buckley, in presenting the report of the Committee, expressed his sense of the delicacy of his position. It was evidently with reluctance that he had to announce the decision of the Committee, to recommend the retirement of five Bishops. While there was the utmost respect and veneration for the venerable men whose lives had been given to the service of the Church, and who had won the love of multitudes by their eloquence and devotion, the Committee had felt that the interests of the Church must be the supreme consideration, and that duty, however painful, must be done. Younger and more energetic men were needed for the long journeys and continual demands on the time and effort of a Bishop, and therefore that the time had come when the men who had passed the line of three score and ten should be relieved of active service.

The five Bishops who had passed this limit were Bishops Andrews, Walden, Mallalieu, Vincent, and Foss. Dr. Andrews is seventy-nine years old, and has been a Bishop since 1872; Dr. Walden, aged seventy-three, has served twenty years; Dr. Mallalieu, seventy-six, also has served twenty years; Dr. Vincent, whose work at Chautauqua has won him world-wide fame, is seventy-two, has been in office sixteen years; and Dr. Foss, who is in his seventy-first year, has a record of twenty-four years of service in the Episcopal office. In addition to these vacancies, another was created by the voluntary retirement of Bishop Merrill, who is seventy-nine years old, and, having served for thirty-two years, has well earned a period of rest.

In view of these retirements, and of the fact that since the last General Conference, the Church has lost by death the services of Bishops Ninde, Foster and Hurst, and Missionary Bishops Taylor and Parker, the decision to elect eight new Bishops was not unexpected. At the time of writing, seven have been chosen. These are Dr. J. F. Berry, the Editor of the Epworth Herald; Dr. Henry Spellmeyer, of Newark, N. J.; Dr. William F. McDowell, of New York; Dr. James W. Bashford, of Delaware, Ohio; Dr. William Burt, who has been laboring in Italy; Dr. Luther B. Wilson, of Baltimore, Md., and Dr. Thomas B. Neely, of Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. William Burt, who was elected on the fifth ballot, is well known to the American churches by reputation. The field of service in which his laurels have been won is in Italy. There he has been Presiding Elder of the Milan District, and has had charge of the Educational and Publishing Bureau. He has done valuable service by his translation of important text-books into Italian, including the Manual for Probationers, in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Burt is fifty-two years of age, and an Englishman by birth. He is a graduate of Wesleyan University of 1879, which, two years ago, conferred on him the degree of D.D. He has been a member of the New York East Conference since 1881.

Dr. Luther B. Wilson is one of the youngest of the ministers elected to the bishopric. He is forty-seven years of age. He has been a member of the Baltimore Conference since 1881. Among the important pulpits he has occupied are the Waugh Church and the Foundry Church, of Washington, D. C. He was for some time Presiding Elder of the Washington District, and has since been Presiding Elder of the Baltimore District.

In addition to the eight Bishops recommended by the Committee, it is proposed to elect four Missionary Bishops. One of these will have part of Bishop Hartzell's enormous field in Africa; two will be for Southern Asia, in which India is included, and a fourth for Japan and Korea, in both of which countries the Methodist Church has made great progress.

The other crucial question to which reference has been made, is the rule as to amusements. It has been urged that the rule strictly forbidding dancing, card-playing and theatre-going, had the effect of keeping of the church many young people of sincere piety, occasionally indulged in these amusements. There were other churches in which no such rule is enforced, and the result has been that Methodism has lost the young people, who object to such severe restrictions, and more liberal churches have gained them. It was therefore suggested that the rule be made advisory, and prohibitive. This would keep the amusements mentioned under the ban of the church, while it would be made incumbent on a minister to exclude persons indulging in them from membership.

The Conference received, on May 17, the report of the Committee which had charge of the suggestion. It appears that a long and animated debate had taken place in the Committee room, when the proposed change had been considered. The final vote revealed the effect of the arguments adduced, and it was predicted that the vote of the Conference would be in similar proportion to the division in the Committee. The recommendation of the Committee was that no change be made in the rule. This decision was reached by a vote of 55 to 45.

It is gratifying to learn from the reports, that charges of heresy which have been made against professors in several Methodist Colleges, and particularly against those in a celebrated institution, have been sustained on investigation. They have been finally disposed of in the Committee on Education. A subcommittee, having in charge the consideration of the memorials and other evidence on this subject, reported to the main committee its recommendation, which, after some discussion, has been adopted. The report says in part:

"We are persuaded that there is no sufficient foundation for the allegation that certain of our theological schools are disloyal to the doctrinal standards of the Church. None of the memorials received contain any specific charges, and there have come to the committee satisfactory statements as to the doctrinal soundness of the teachings in one of the institutions in the reports of the numerous visitors appointed by the Conference."

CLOTHING MACEDONIA'S NEEDY ONES

ALTHOUGH THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S relief work in Macedonia has closed, as far as the need of collecting and forwarding further funds is concerned, Pastor Popoff writes that the distribution of clothing and other articles supplied by the fund is still going on in many districts. In a letter dated at Sophia, April 26, he says:

"I am by to-day's mail sending you a photograph just brought to me from Dubnitz, illustrating the distribution of CHRISTIAN HERALD clothing in that city. The committee still has a small amount remaining of the money sent, which we are holding for urgent needs,

DISTRIBUTION OF CHRISTIAN HERALD FUND CLOTHING AMONG THE REFUGEES AT DUBNITZA

when the refugees begin to return."

From Salonica, Turkey, April 1, Rev. E. B. Haske writes:

"Your letter of March 24, giving specifications as to the use of the $7,000, was duly received. Dr. Marsh of Philippopolis, quite hopeful that under the recently proclaimed amnesty the Adrianople refugees may be able to return, and is anxious to help them do so. One more distribution to some of the Monastir village may be necessary, in order to prevent suffering. But if Dr. Marsh can use money to advantage in Adrianople district in rehabilitating refugees, I shall feel like passing over to him what he may call for."

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Never-Ending Battle with the Moth

ABOUT this time every season, the housekeeper must renew the old conflict with the little moth that lurks in dark closets and locked trunks, eats its way into furs and wool, and leaves a trail of destruction behind it. Nothing is more exasperating than to take from its shelf, drawer or nail, a garment which one fancied was perfectly immune from the predatory moth, and find it disfigured, if not ruined by this vexatious insect. The thorough housewife does this every year as a matter of course, and one must inspect with the utmost care, her attic, cellar, and all her closets and wardrobes, turning all little tucked away nooks and corners, under the stairs or under the eaves. Each of these places is administered upon with radical care, with broom, scrubbing, mop, duster, and finally whitewash, till sweet and clean, the moth will probably find no breeding ground. At present there is a pestiless looking little creature much like a bug, as to outward semblance, which is the moth, which has an insatiable appetite for carpets, rugs and upholstered furniture. It should be pitilessly exterminated before it develops into its future state as a caterpillar. I speak of garrets and cellars, and full well that the vast majority of housekeepers have neither.

One day a New York woman showed me her sumptuous apartment, overlooking Central Park, in which was every possible luxury of electricity and steam, with appointments befitting a palace, and far surpassing many of the palaces of Europe. Having enjoyed all the advantages of her home, she spoke deprecatingly of its disadvantages. "When I lived in the South," she said, "I had a rambling house with an immense garret, an ample store room, and I had plenty of space wherein to bestow my goods. Just look at this," and she lifted up the valance of the bed, showing boxes and trunks closely packed beneath it, where various garments were stored away. Every divan was beneath its cushions a receptacle for coats, trousers, skirts and gowns, and it took considerable striving on the part of this matron to keep the external portion of her apartment neat and orderly, so much below the surface had the goods compressed as best it could.

Wherever we happen to live, we do not store our clothing, our blankets, our rugs or our carpets to be attacked and devoured by moths. If once they gain a foothold, which they do by depositing their eggs in the folds of fabrics, it is useless to fight them by any means at the disposal of the ordinary housewife. I once bought an exceedingly elegant and costly lounge, covered with an Oriental rug of great beauty. A few days after I had happily set this piece of furniture in my library, I discovered, to my chagrin, that it was literally alive with moths. I sent it back to the man from whom I had bought it. He told me that he could exterminate the pest, and I presume he did so, but I did not deign to accept it again. The method used by him was to thoroughly fumigate the room in which he set the moth-ridden article, closing every aperture and crevice, and burning sulphur therein for many hours. This is said to destroy all insect life. Such things as camphor, pepper, tobacco, moth-balls, tar, and every similar device of no manner of good, if the moth eggs have been deposited already. You may as well save your pence as your pains.

Every separate article before being put away for the summer, should be thoroughly beaten, shaken and sunned; every spot and stain of grease removed, and the article made altogether clean.

Gar bags, which come in different sizes, from 30 x 50 inches, to 30 x 90, are excellent for putting away jackets, cloaks and overcoats, and they may be hung close together on ordinary coat-hangers, in a closet. The mistress of a flat will find these very convenient, as they take up little room. They should occasionally be taken out and looked over. Costly furs are best sent to a dealer, who will look them over, put them away in cold storage, and return them in good condition in the autumn, charging for his trouble a percentage on their value, to cover his labor and the usual insurance. Housekeepers who go away from home for the summer months should, so far as possible, protect furniture and rugs by an extremely careful process of cleansing before they go, and by a liberal use of moth balls and camphor. These should be sprinkled everywhere in closets and corners, and the rooms should then be closed as tightly as possible. Unless the moth is already in possession, it will not venture in if this sort of care is taken. Housekeeping is anyway a never-ending battle with dirt, dust and plagues of one sort or another. Happy is the woman who possesses her soul

—MRS. A. No particular form of letter is required to acknowledge silver wedding gifts. A pleasant, cordial note, saying that the gift is just what you wanted, and that Mr. A. unites in thanking the giver is all that is necessary.

—LUCY JANE. You do not have to thank a man who escorts you home from a party, after taking you there, for the thanks are partly on his side. Still it is a graceful thing to say, "I thank you for your courtesy," or, "I have had a very pleasant time, thank you."

—MAYME. A lady never accepts expensive jewelry or dress goods from any man not related to her, as her father or brothers. She may take a ring or a brooch from her fiancé, but custom forbids his offering her a gown.

A Neighborhood Club

WOMEN who have no particular interest in club life, if such there be, who never expect to attend a Federation Meeting, and who belong to the stay-at-home variety, may reap much enjoyment from a neighborhood circle, which they may or may not call a club.

Twenty years ago, for example, twenty-five young matrons, living near one another in a suburb of a large city, decided to meet and talk things over, once a fortnight. They did not wish to prepare or read papers; they were not resolved on any special line of study; they simply designed in a friendly way to get together and converse. Each lady brought her sewing or her mending or her knitting to this afternoon session, beginning at three, and ending at six, and sometimes they had a cup of tea, and sometimes lemonade and cake.

They discussed their children, their household perplexities, their kitchen-maids, the price of coal and flour, the best ways of housewifery, and whatever happened at the moment to be of interest. Gradually they broadened their range, and took up current events at each meeting, bringing in a breath of stimulating life from the wide world beyond their doors. There were no dues, no officers, no by-laws, and no rules, except one, that the absent were to be spoken of kindly, and gossip was not to be tolerated.

A score of years has slipped by with lightning speed, but the friends continue to meet on Wednesday afternoons. They bring their guests, and their young daughters now and then; occasionally they have an evening company when the husbands are allowed to be present. This is a gala occasion, and is much appreciated.

Mercifully no one in the group of friends has been called hence by death, although illness has at times detained some from the circle. The neighborhood has been happier for the pleasant informality of this little club, which is not a club in the modern sense, although clubbable women compose it.

Something About Palmistry

Without giving one's entire credence to the language of the hand as read by experts, one cannot but feel some interest when a wise woman, taking hold of the fingers, scans them, and peers into the palm with its criss-cross of intricate lines. Creepy shivers are apt to run down the spine, if the palmist looks mysterious and seems to hesitate about foretelling fate. The truth is, that no seer or sage of to-day is in any sense a fortune-teller, and only foolish people with money to waste, seek the persons who profess to reveal the secrets of the future. Most lovingly our Father in heaven has hung a veil over the morrow, and has bidden us to do the day's work with cheery courage, leaving the end of our days with Him.

What the hand-reader can and does do, is to give hints, more or less near reality, about character and aptitudes. We write ourselves on our hands. A hand indicates strength or weakness, selfishness or generosity, an artistic bent, or a practical turn. Beautiful hands are as much to be desired as a beautiful face. In every picture, if the painter belong to those in the first rank, the hands will show careful treatment, for they are sure to possess individuality.

A soft, flabby hand, limp and languid, shows not merely physical feebleness, but a vacillating and infirm temper and will. A firm, cordial, close-grasping hand, shows tenacity of purpose and the ability to get on and to keep one's own.

An authority on hands tells us that palmistry is very ancient, having been practiced centuries before our Lord came to the earth, especially being valued by the Greeks. The energetic or spatulate hand belongs to explorers, discoverers, inventors, and restless, pushing people, who are full of enterprise and assiduity.

In this hand the great breadth is at the base of the palm and the spreading tips of the fingers. The artistic hand is graceful, with delicate contours, and fingers broad at the base and tapering at the tips. A square hand indicates an orderly and practical nature; it is the hand of the successful mechanic and of the notable housekeeper.

"The thumb," says a clever writer, "is the king of the hand, uniting the will, logic, love and the source of love."

In the lines of the palm the "life-line" is the most likely to appeal to any of us. If it is long, clear, straight and deeply indented, it signifies a probability of living to old age in good health. A faint and short life-line may entirely change its character, and become strong and long, if one's health improves and one's vitality is reinforced.

When all is said, the best and most beautiful hand in the whole world is the hand that does most to help its dear ones and to bless the home and the race.

GOOD Health is Promoted

—by Pure and—Wholesome Food

A housekeepers should before look very carefully to a matter which vitally concerns every member of the household.

A good cake can be made with good eggs, so is a cake that is healthful as well as dainty must be raised with a pure and select baking powder.

Real Baking Powder is indispensable in the preparation of the highest quality of food. It imparts that peculiar lightness, sweetness and flavor noted in the finest cake, and what is more important, renders the food wholesome and agreeable to young and old.

Just an "East Side Boy"

By MARY MARGARET REMINGTON

A HUNDRED voices rose in unison. In fact new life had burst out as if by magic, for out of the open schoolhouse door rushed the boys this early spring afternoon. The studies of the day were of the past now, and the next on the programme was a little fun. So as they jumped and ran and screamed, the pent-up spirits so long restrained now were given vent. Up the street they went, until one of the parks on the East Side was reached.

"I say, boys," spoke one of the boys, one of a dozen who were spinning their tops; "boys, you all like my big musical top. Now, let's have a race across the park. Now, I won't be selfish, and I'll put up this top for the prize, and the one who wins shall have it. All form in line; you Jakey stand back, you are too far ahead. Now—one—two—"

"Yes, yer will, will yer. Git along at once, ye lazy, good-for-nothing boy, an' help me. Here I've been waiting for ye a long time after school, an' only to find ye here playing wid yer top. I wish these school-teachers had kep' their tops to him, that's what I do. Come along wid ye! Yer hear me—do yer?"

The bright face of the boy, all aglow a moment before with happiness and pleasure, fell as he looked at the uncanny apparition before him, who, with hand already laid upon his shoulder, showed by every look that it would be impossible to disobey the mandate just uttered, "to go home and help." So with a "Good-bye, boys, another time," the boy in question walked in the direction indicated by the person who seemed to have authority.

Down several narrow streets they went, until finally they halted along by the landing where the great coal barges come in, and where the large coal carts piled on their black, shining masses. Here all along, for quite a distance, could be seen pieces of coal lying on the ground. No one seemed to claim it, so many were the hands picking it up, piece by piece, and placing it in large-mouthed sacks.

"Now go to work with ye, jest as fast as ye can work, for almost all the best of it has been picked up already. So much for having ye educated. This is the way ye treat yer Aunt. I've the greatest mind to take ye out of school, an make ye pick coal all day long."

With the scolding in his ears, the child bent down and began the monotonous and disagreeable task of "picking coal." This he persevered in for a long time; in fact, it was growing dark when the last bit was put in the large sack, and he was ordered to "Lift it on yer shoulder now. What are yer here for, to stand there gawping at me?"

After many fruitless efforts, the bag at last was balanced over his shoulder, and under its weight, he staggered, rather than walked, to the place called home.

Wearied after his hard work, and glad to get away from a cutting tongue, our little fellow, whose name was Sam, then threw himself on his bed for the night, and fell asleep. It must have been he had sweet slumbers, for a sweet smile broke on his face, and when morning came, and a peremptory shake and a voice saying, "Git up wid ye, do ye hear me?" brought him to a realization that he was not dreaming; but the smile still clung to his lips, and threw over his face a brightness and cheer.

After the lessons of the day were over, his teacher always held a half hour of talk with the boys. In this little talk, she drew the boys out and learned much of their life and ambitions. This day Sam's teacher told them "she wished if any of the boys had a story to tell, he would tell it to them all." So Sam rose and said:

"Teacher, I have something to tell. I think it must be a dream, but I have not been able to get it out of my mind all day. It is this—I was spinning my top that you gave me for Christmas, one day in the park, and pretty soon I saw some one coming toward me, and I saw it was a pleasant looking man, and he said, 'Come into the country with me? I want a boy.'

"Indeed, yes," I said, 'I'll go.'
"So on we went together. Pretty soon we came to where there were no signs of 'Keep off the grass,' and there were such pretty flowers along by the side of the road. I picked them as I went along, and then we came to a house. We stopped there, and the man said, smiling: 'This is my house, let us go in and have some supper, then we will go on to the lake.'

We did go in, and I ate until I could not eat any more. Oh, it was good! Then we took a walk by a most beautiful lake, with great big trees all along its sides. Then, teacher, once in a while a little fish would jump about in the water. After walking through the meadows (the gentleman called them), and seeing lots of cows and horses, then it was growing dark, so we went back, and I was given a room to sleep in. I went to bed in such a soft, nice bed, and, after a while, I dreamed I was in fairyland, and the fairies were making great wreaths of flowers. They worked very hard, all the fairies did, and finally they fixed the wreaths in great long festoons about a room, and then they led me up to a great, big chair, and one fairy said:

"We are going to make you a king among us, and we have fixed the wreaths of flowers so that the room will look just as a king's should. Now, Mr. King, what do you want your fairy subjects to do?"

"I thought just a minute, then I said: 'Go into the crowded cities, and take all the little ones out into the country to breathe the good, fresh air, and the little boys and girls who have to pick up coal; take them by the hand, and lead them out here, where it is so beautiful; and make them happy.'

"We will go, your Majesty," they answered. And away they flew, while I was left on my throne all alone. After a time they returned, and each one of them had a little coal-pick by his dirty little hand, and they brought them before me, and said:

"Here they are, your Majesty. Now, we will have a banquet." So all the little coal-pickers sat down to a table, with the fairies to wait on them. Such a fine meal as they had. There were little angels on the dishes, and such dainty things to eat. After the banquet the fairies cleared the tables away, and they all danced, and were so merry. When night came they gave the little coal-pickers some nice, downy couches to lie on, made from milkweed pods, and they kept guard. But there I sat all night. I grew very sleepy, but I could not sleep. When morning came, the fairies opened the eyes of the little coal-pickers, and then said:

"Our King tells us you have a hard time in the city, so you are to stay with us for a long time. You will have nothing to do but make merry. Now, our king must go and have his sleep." As they danced before me I went back to my room in the house, from where I came, and when I lay down I went to sleep, and did not waken for some years." Then

BOTH JAWS SHOT AWAY Still a Successful Business Man

A man who had both jaws shot away had trouble eating ordinary food, but found a food-drink that supplies the nutrient needed. He says:

"I have been an invalid since the siege of Vicksburg, in 1866, where I was wounded by a Minie ball passing through my head and causing the entire loss of my jaws. I was a drummer boy, and at the time was leading a skirmish line, carrying a gun. Since that time I have been awarded the medal of honor from the Congress of the United States for gallantry on the field.

"The consequences of my wound were dyspepsia in its most aggravated form, and I finally proved ordinary coffee was very hard on my stomach, so I tried Postum, and got better. Then I tried common coffee again, and got worse. I did this several times, and finally, as Postum helped me every time, I continued to use it, and how often I think that if the Government had issued Postum to us in the Army, how much better it would have been for the soldier boys than coffee.

"Coffee constipates me, and Postum does not; coffee makes me spit up my food, Postum does not; coffee keeps me awake nights, Postum does not. There is no doubt coffee is too much of a stimulant for most people, and is the cause of nearly all the constipation.

"This is my experience, and you are at liberty to use my name." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

CONCLUDED FROM PRECEDING PAGE

said Sam, after a little. "I was awakened by my Aunt and told to 'get up.'"

Several months had flown. The children of the city were being sent into the wide open country. Each taking their turn, and the children of Sam's school had in turn gone and returned, only to tell of "beautiful flowers, plenty to eat, and a good time generally."

Sam's turn came as one bright morning he took the train, with his little bundle of clothing in his hand. All was new to him as the train flew along, and visions of stream and hills, changing with cattle grazing in open country, and an occasional little village hugging the side of the mountain. Sam was entranced, for this was his first visit into the country. The hot city with coal-picking, that detestable business, was being left behind, and his dream of fairyland was almost becoming true. If he looked through the car, would he not find many other little coal-pickers like himself, and they were all going into the lovely country, with its myriads of flowers, its cool breezes, and, best of all, "lots to eat." This reminded Sam of his little lunch of rye bread, but he was too full seeing new things to think of eating. So they flew along until night brought them to their destination. A pleasant kind-faced man met them at the station, who reminded Sam of the one in his dream. He took them to a house, so pleasantly situated, and here they were told "to make themselves merry, and feel at home." To say that boys full of life and spirits soon make themselves happy and at home is usually a foregone conclusion. But no boys could have had a more cheerful greeting than these in this pretty little farmhouse.

The days came and went all too soon. The time allotted for their holiday was fast drawing to a close, and finally the boys, after many regrets, started back to the hot city with hands filled with many good things, and with many remembrances of kindness and happiness long to be remembered. The brooks had been fished in. The hay had been piled on big wagons, and with boys on the loads had been driven away. The cows had been taken from pasture each evening, and the delicious milk had been drunk by all. The hens had been found on their nests, and one rainy day, what glorious times! they all played circus in the large barn. All the pleasure that boys could possibly get into two weeks, was certainly found in those two.

Sam was very thoughtful after reaching the old home in the hot city. It was the beginning of a new life to him. An insight into healthier, better ways of living. He vowed that as soon as he could, he would make a man of importance of himself. The boy had grown into a man in those two weeks. Resolves of greater things had taken possession of him, and when the opportunity came he should embrace it.

We will pass over Sam's life of a few years. He finished his school, and an opportunity, an opening for his going into the country came. He embraced it. Threw off the old life; with it one of the bad dreams of his existence, to be forgotten, if possible. He took what offered first. Success followed this venture. As when a boy the Christmas top made music in his ear, so now, the music of healthy prospects, of improvement in life, spun about and whirled before him. A natural refinement helped him through many hard places, and made him sail above many obstacles. And so we see him making a place in the world, faster and faster, as one success follows another, spurred on by good motives and an ever kind heart, until we see him as one of the leaders in the place he now calls home. Home in its broadest sense—of love and happiness thrown about it.

The boy Sam, as he was led away years ago, by the unscrupulous, low being, who claimed his services, and who in some manner had gotten hold of the boy, now is the man Samuel. Looked up to by those about him, and in his life brightness and cheeriness is constantly shed over all; and one day as he sits in his home, he relates the dream of years ago, where he was made "King of the Fairies," and how his first desire was to alleviate the sufferings of the poor little coal-pickers, and the poor children of the crowded tenements of the cities.

It seemed to be only a forecast of what would follow in later years, for now, as the summers come, the little coal-pickers and tenement-dwellers of our large city are brought to him, and a merry two weeks each one has, while he delights making them happy.

TAYLOR UNIVERSITY'S NEW PRESIDENT

EARLY congratulations are due to Taylor University at Upland, Ind., on securing for its Presidential chair the services of Rev. Winchester, A.M., D.D., whose inauguration it has just celebrated. The late President, Dr. J. C. Taylor, who had worked untiringly to bring the university to its present high degree of efficiency, created a vacancy that was difficult to fill. There are few men of the necessary qualifications for the position of a university, who are prepared to sacrifice themselves so utterly for the welfare of an institution as the chief of Taylor University must be. In that seat of learning are young men and women who have entered its service, with the single purpose of becoming efficient and effective workers in his vineyard. They come from all classes and all parts of the world's wealth, and try to give themselves to God and ask only that they be prepared for their future. It is a privilege to serve such students, but it can be done only by one who is willing to give himself and his whole world to the glory of God and the welfare of his army.

REV. C. W. WINCHESTER, D.D.

Dr. Winchester realizes the situation, and he showed by his inaugural address that he accepts the responsibility. He brings to his work with an experience and ability fitting him for his duties. He is a graduate of the University of Syracuse, N. Y., from which he has received a degree of Doctor of Divinity. His position as a Greek scholar is so high that he was invited by one of our largest universities to become its professor of Greek, but he preferred the work of the ministry, and has devoted to it the greater part of his life. He entered the General Conference in 1876, and served it as conference secretary and as presiding officer of its largest district. He has occupied principal pulpits, and has done a great deal of literary work as editor of Christian Uplook and the Buffalo Christian Advocate. He has also been in touch with educational matters by his long service on the board of Trustees of Genesee Conference Seminary. Several works have become known to the reading world, among them, The Gospel Kodak Abroad and The Victories of Wesley Castle.

His work as President of Taylor University will be thoroughly congenial to him. The students are intelligent, enthusiastic and intensely earnest. Among them, are representatives of twenty-four States and four foreign countries. Nearly a score of able professors compose the faculty, all imbued with the spirit of the university and devoted to their work. The atmosphere of the place is thoroughly evangelical, and everyone connected with it is inspired with that ardor for soul-winning which rendered the name of the late Bishop Taylor, with whom it is identified, famous the world over.

The inaugural exercises continued from April 28 to May 2. Among its features were sermons by Rev. William Potts George, LL.D., D.D.; Rev. T. J. Bassett, LL.D., D.D., and Rev. G. A. McLaughlin, D.D. Addresses were given by Rev. A. B. Riker, A.M., D.D.; Rev. L. A. Beeks, and Rev. Thos. M. Smith, and an unusually bright musical programme was rendered by the Musical Department of the university. In the course of an exhaustive and able inaugural address, Dr. Winchester said:

Taylor University stands for all that is highest and best in intellectual culture. It stands for primitive Christianity—for the "faith once for all delivered to the saints." It stands for an unutilized Bible—the Old Testament of Christ and Paul, and the man who wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the New Testament of Christ and his apostles. Taylor stands for primitive manners. Her students cannot touch the wine-cup, practice the social dance, frequent the play-house or handle the gambler's tools. That may be narrow, but so it is. Taylor stands for pure air, pure blood and pure brain. No tobacco smoke or juice can pollute these grounds. It may seem small to say that. But tobacco is depleting our American manhood; and it is time for someone to speak out. Taylor stands for refinement—no brutality, no brutal sports, nothing which tends toward savagery and animalism. Above all else Taylor stands for Christian Holiness, for the doctrine and experience of heart purity, as taught by Wesley, and Paul and Christ. Against all fanaticism we are everlastingly opposed. But for the holy fire which has always burned in hearts of God's saints, we most earnestly pray and seek. May heaven send it on us now! Our flag is nailed to the mast. If Taylor remains true to her present ideals, her future is secure; God will give her all the dollars and disciples she needs. If she lowers her standard, neither God nor good men will have any use for her. I accept the trust reposed in me. I did not seek this office; I did not desire it. I believe God has called me. I am here to do his work as best I can, with his help and yours, as long as he shall will.

NEW Version of the 23d Psalm

Yea, the Lord is the Lord Most High,
Therefore my wants shall be supplied;
He makes me lie down in green pastures,
He leads me in quiet waters sweetly glide.
He restores my soul,
He leads me in righteous ways.
He leads me on; and his grace and sweet control
Is his own sweet name alone.

Though I walk through death's dark shade,
No evil thing my heart shall fear;
For I have need to be afraid,
Because I know that Thou art near.

Yea, Thou hast richly spread
The presence of my bitter foes;
And Thou dost anoint my head,
My cup with plenty overflows.

By Thy goodness and Thy tender love
Shall I follow me till life shall end;
Thou shalt have my everlasting years I'll spend.

Music, Cant. REV. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

The Happy Heart

THE great I envy not,
Nor seek what worldlings prize;
Mine is a happier lot,
Whose home is in the skies.
To pride it may be sweet,
Rank, riches to possess;
To lie at Jesus' feet
This, this is happiness!

What are the cares of life?
Soon, soon all cares will cease;
Above the world's vain strife
The Christian soars in peace.
Trials in vain annoy,
While to the Cross we press;
Earth has its fading joy—
But this is happiness!

Oh, may I part with all
Ere I such hope resign!
Lord, keep me, lest I fall,
Nor let my faith decline.
To rest on Thee alone,
To feel Thy power to bless,
To live, to die Thine Own—
This, this is happiness!

The Rest, Ps. MANDA J. SANGREE.

Roof/Leak?

applied on an old leaky shingle, tin or felt roof will make it absolutely waterproof. Stops the rusting process in tin or iron, and stops warping or rotting of shingles. Will add ten years to the life of a new or old roof.

ROOF LEAK is the most durable sun or winter proof paint or coating possible to make. Does not crack in winter or soften in summer. Easily applied. Imparts no taste to water.

ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP renders the wood absolutely weatherproof, and when the shingles are nailed on the roof, they become cemented together so tightly that warping, which causes cracked shingles and loose nails, is positively prevented.

ROOF LEAK is shipped in the heavy liquid cement form, and is applied as received on worn and leaky surfaces. It is reduced with one quart of boiled linseed-oil to each gallon, if used as a durable paint on surfaces in good condition. Shingle Dip is shipped ready for dipping.

ROOF LEAK COATING AND ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP are made in Black, Maroon, and Dark Green. Five gallons up to any quantity, 75c. per gallon, freight paid east of Denver. Returnable at our expense, if not approved.

ROOF LEAK is sold by up-to-date paint and hardware dealers. Those who try to sell you something else are not doing you justice, because "there is nothing else like ROOF LEAK."

Liquid samples, together with an interesting booklet showing its various uses, will be sent on request, or to enable you to give it a practical test, we will send you for $1.00, delivered free to your door, one gallon, which is sufficient for cementing 100 square feet of leaky surface, or painting 200 square feet. One gallon of Shingle Dip covers about 400 square feet shingles, both sides.

A Gift of Roses

By HELENA H. THOMAS

"YES, it is a beautiful sight, sure enough, ma'am," said the sexton, as he looked from right to left, "flowers, flowers everywhere!"

"Surely there have been few neglected graves this year," said Mrs. Raymond, who had chosen the twilight hour for a visit to the "White City."

"But there would have been one, ma'am, for a fact, if it hadn't been for one of God's little angels."

"Why, what do you mean?" was the puzzled query.

"I'll show you the grave if you don't mind going to such a lonesome part of the cemetery," said the old sexton, who had been heard to say, "Every inch of this ground seems sacred to me, because my own dead lie here."

"Why, why! No headstone! and yet covered with costly flowers!" exclaimed Mrs. Raymond, as the caretaker of the cemetery halted in a remote corner and pointed to a rose-covered grave, which an overgrown hedge had hidden from view until full upon it. "Can you explain the mystery?"

"Yes; yes, I can, and that is why I brought you here. You see I've took notice ever since you've been comin' here that you talk to children like you took an interest in 'em, and so, says I to myself, when I see you up yonder tendin' your lot, 'I'll happen along when she comes back, an' tell her as sweet a Decoration Day story as she ever heard.' And now if you'll sit down on that curb I'll tell you how them beautiful roses come there."

Saying which the old sexton leaned on his shovel, while Mrs. Raymond, all eagerness, took the seat suggested and listened to the following:

"That is the grave of an old soldier, whose widow is so feeble that she hasn't been here in years, till to-day. But a spell back, she always came on Decoration Day, bringing her arms full o' snow-balls to put on this grave. She used to say, kind of pitiful:

"My Jamie was only a common soldier, you know, an' seein' his grave is way down in this corner I'm afraid it wouldn't have any flowers on it if I didn't bring 'em, so I'm comin' long's I can get here."

"I told her his grave would always have some flowers on it, while I was sexton, an' every year since I've kept my word. But I clear forgot it to-day, for it seems like everybody, but you, left their decoration to do this mornin', an' I was so drove that I never once thought of 'Jamie's grave,' as I always call it, until—now comes the story."

"Crowds of school children, as well as the old soldiers from the Home, had been here, an' decorated an' decorated, till the place, most of it, anyhow, looked like it had all blossomed out, when I heard:

"Please, Mister Sexton, where can I put 'em?"

"Then I saw the angel I told you about, with her apron full o' roses that must a' cost a heap o' money, seein' they come from the greenhouse, an' I says: 'Where do you want to put 'em, little girl?'"

"Did you know the child?" here interrupted Mrs. Raymond, her eyes alight with interest.

"I've seen her when I passed the brownstone house in the next block; but I knew her folk's hadn't anybody buried here, 'cause they moved here just a spell ago. So I didn't know what to think o' all them roses, but when I asked her where she wanted to put 'em she said, just as innocent-like:

"You tell me where. The graves here have lots an' lots o' flowers; but maybe you know a lonesome grave, mister?"

"Then I thought o' 'Jamie's grave,' an' it made me feel streaked, too, seein' the promise I made the widow; but it was lucky I did forget, seein' it got all them roses on it fer her to see—but there, I'm gettin' ahead o' my story.

"Well, I took that pretty creature by the hand, and told her how there was one soldier's grave that hadn't a flower on it, an' when I tol' her more about it, on our way here, she said:

"I'll make believe it's my very own grandpa's grave."

"Then she told me how she had gone with her grandma last Decoration Day, to put flowers on her grandpa's grave, way off in Vermont, an' how her grandma had died since, an' how she had come here where she hadn't any graves, 'all her own to tend.'"

"I declare for it, ma'am, I couldn't keep the tears back to hear that child talk, for all the world like grown folks, who feel homesick for the dead they leave behind 'em, an' so I says:

"But there are always graves that need tendin', little girl, so whenever you have flowers to spare bring 'em here, an' I'll show you where to put 'em!"

"It would have done your heart good, ma'am, for it did mine, if you could have watched that child puttin' these roses on that 'poor, lonesome grave,' as she kept callin' it, an' heard her say so sweet-like:

"You was a soldier, too, an' you shall have nice flowers on your grave!"

"Then, when she had got it all to her mind, she sat where you are, ma'am, an' told me all about the roses."

"Auntie was married last night," she said, an' I cried an' cried when she went away, an' so mamma, to comfort me, told me it was Decoration Day, an' how I could come this little ways, all by myself, an' bring lots o' roses. An' she told me to 'member my grandpa was a soldier, an' to put 'em on some lonesome lookin' grave, for his sake. But I looked an' looked, an' couldn't find any with little flags but what had flowers on 'em, so I asked you, an' now this doesn't look lonesome any more. It is jus' beautiful!"

"The dear child!" exclaimed Mrs. Raymond, wiping her eyes; "I thank you so much for telling me about her."

"But the best part of the story is yet to come, and the strangest, too," said the sexton, with a choke in his voice. "The child had just left the cemetery when a hack-driver beckoned to me an' asked me where the grave of that very soldier was. Said his widow was in the hack, but that she was so old she had forgotten where her own husband was buried."

"I told him to drive on an' I would follow an' point it out to her. An' it is well that I did, for the old lady was so feeble an' excited it took us both to get her to the grave, an' then, as soon as we let go, she tumbled all in a heap, an' buried her face right in them roses, an' began to cry so it broke the hackman all up, an' he went back to his rig in a hurry. But I didn't like to leave her alone—for I've got an old mother buried here, ma'am, an' I love all old ladies for her sake. So I waited, but didn't try to stop her, for I've been a sexton so long I've learned that it is kindness to let 'em have their cry out."

"There's a big difference in tears, too, ma'am, and when Jamie's widow—I never can think of her as havin' any other name—looked up, after I'd waited an' waited, I saw her's wasn't the sorry kind, for she laughed more'n she cried, when she said: 'I—saved—fifty cents so's I could come to Jamie's grave once more, 'fore I lie here, but it most broke my heart 'cause I hadn't any flowers to put on it, an' now—to—find it—like—this!'"

"Then she cried some more, and to chirp her up a bit, I told her all about the roses, an' how the little angel had put 'em there, an' when I'd got through tellin' it, the widow reached out, an' pickin' up a rose kissed it, like it was her long-dead Jamie, sayin': 'It—was—one—of—God's—angels—surely.'"

"Then I knew she wanted to be alone with her dead, so I left her there."

THE STORY OF LORETTA

"CAN'T you take her? Oh, she needs just the care you can give her, at the sunshine and fresh air. Why, just think, she's never been in the sunshine for more than a few minutes at a time, and she came here." The speaker was a head-nurse in one of the wards in a children's free hospital in the metropolis, and her earnest words were addressed to a tall young woman in the garb of a deaconess. "I had come that morning from a home for the sick little ones, away up among the hills and the pine trees of the country."

"Just come and look at her, anyhow, if you have not room for her," said the nurse, knowing full well that the tender heart of the deaconess was not proof against the sufferings of a little child, and that her faith was strong in the ability and wisdom of God to supply the means for caring for the little ones, after he had shown the need.

"The fact is," she went on, "it may mean only her death soon, but untold suffering in death comes. The doctors pronounce her incurable, and say she needs no medical treatment, and we cannot keep her, for we do not have the room for some child that does need treatment. But she has absolutely nothing to go, except back to the dingy, dirty little room where her father lives alone, and so poor that he can hardly keep soul and body together."

"At this time they had reached the bed

station and gave her to the deaconess, who carried her to a seat by the car-window. Then the wonders began. Little sunbeams of smiles chased themselves over Loretta's face, as the charms of hill and vale revealed themselves to her. But when she was taken from the car, and put into the seat of the wagon, behind the big horses, she shrank into the sheltering arms of the deaconess in fright. And when she was carried into a pretty little room at the Home, with its white bed and furniture, its bright rug and pictures, her expressive face was a study, as it scanned everything, and then looked up at the motherly deaconess bending over her, as if the "thank you" were just struggling to say itself.

Now a new life truly began. Knowing her sad story, each one strove to make Loretta forget the long, monotonous weariness of her past, and to fill the days with joy and sunshine, and the nights with rest and peace.

It is a happy family at the Watts de Peyster Home for Invalid Children. All were glad to welcome little Loretta as a sister, and spared no pains to make her life a little brighter. The Home is situated at Verbank, N. Y., among the Berkshire Hills. There are received little invalids and cripples from the crowded tenement houses and dens of the great city; those who are convalescing from periods of illness or from serious operations; where little Loretta lay, and though she was as pale as paper, she roused up and looked at them with a slight smile. The nurse turned down the covers and disclosed the poor little wasted body, the shrunken limbs twisted around each other, and the tiny wrists and claw-like hands. To the questions of the nurse, the little one could reply, "Yes," or "No." The tender heart of the deaconess was melted.

"He may get much stronger, if she can have sunshine and life under the pine trees," said the nurse; "with nourishing food." The nurse took the little sufferer up to the

those who cannot gain admittance to hospitals and to whom no country homes are open because of their poverty and ailments, but who are in need of rest, nourishing food and fresh air.

Miss Florence Mahin, the deaconess in charge of the Home, has a corps of trained assistants. There is no endowment or society for the support of this worthy benevolence. All the expenses are defrayed by voluntary gifts. Any contribution sent to Deaconess in Charge, Home for Invalid Children, Verbank, N. MAC'S LUCK

The Young Woman Reporter's Story

The following food tale, written by a clever young newspaper woman is a true story that came under her personal observation.

"I have been with the — (a paper in a Calif. town) for nine years, and Mac has been with us all the time, and I do not know how much longer. Mac's full name is MacClellan. Before the Linotypes came in he was a good printer, and was one of the first to learn the machine, and is now, at about the age of 42, one of our very fastest operators.

"Last winter, and the winter before, Mac, probably from constant night work and improper food, got badly run down, could not eat much; what little he did eat did not do him much good, and he always complained he could not keep warm.

"I missed him for awhile, until yesterday I overtook him on the street, going toward the office, and hardly knew the man; had it not been for the familiar walk, I should surely have passed without recognizing him. He was stout, his face was round and ruddy, and his eyes bright as I had never seen them before.

"I said, 'Mac, I hardly knew you. What on earth have you been doing to get so fat?' He replied, 'Grape-Nuts, nothing else. I started in on Grape-Nuts food three months ago, when I weighed 126, and was feeling miserable, but now I weigh 160, and feel better than I ever felt in my life. I quit my old diet and went on Grape-Nuts, and that's the whole story.' Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Exercise is necessary, but there's no nourishment in it, and proper food alone can supply that. Grape-Nuts for 10 days is a pleasant trial, and proves big things.

There's a reason.

Conditions of Discipleship*

WHAT must I do to become a Christian? is a question, which, notwithstanding all the preaching that is done, is not answered to the satisfaction of many inquirers. There are vague ideas that daily Bible reading, daily prayer, regular attendance at church, baptism, church-membership, conduct free from open or secret sin, and liberal giving to charity and church funds, are the main elements of Christian life. There is not a word to be said against any of these; all are Christian duties, but the conditions of becoming a true Christian are not in these. A man may do all of them and not be a Christian. The Apostle goes further still. He says that a man might give everything he has to feed the poor, and might go to the stake to be burned for Christ's sake, without having in him the essentials of Christianity.

So much is said in revival sermons, about, "accepting Christ;" so much emphasis is placed on the assurance, that, if a man "believes" on Christ, he shall be saved, that people have come to place a light estimate on the conditions of discipleship. Simple assent to the truths of the Gospel is not all. The object of Christ's coming was, not so much to save men from punishment, as to save them from sin. Let a man set out to make his life sinless, in deed, word and thought, and he will find out how tremendous an undertaking he has on hand. It is so difficult, that he soon discovers that, without some aid, it is impossible. Christ came to give that aid, and he is still ready to give it to all who desire it. The Christian is a man who is earnestly striving after that sinlessness, and has accepted Christ—has believed on Christ—as the Being who can and will enable him to attain it. He wants to be saved from the punishment of sins that he has already committed, and he wants to be saved from the power of that something in his nature, which is all the time impelling him to evil.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for June 12. Matt. 10: 24 26; John 13: 33-35.

thoughts, words and deeds. Christ answers both wants.

The entrance to Christ's kingdom, therefore, is not for good men only. The man who comes to the door and applies for admission, is not asked if he has reformed, if he has done this or that. Many wait before coming to Christ to make themselves fit. That is a mistake. It is like a diseased man trying to cure himself before he goes to the doctor. The one thing necessary is that he wants to be saved. If he is in earnest, if he realizes how important it is for him to be saved, and is prepared to submit to the treatment, for the sake of the boon, Christ can and will save him. There is no question, either, about how bad, or how good he is. Christ undertakes the case of a child, comparatively innocent, as he does the case of a hardened old profligate who is corrupt to the core.

If the sinner comes in this spirit, then he is accepted. It is expected of him that he will make full surrender. As a doctor would not accept a patient who would not follow directions, so Christ expects the man whom he has accepted to work with him for his own deliverance. One man has to make one kind of struggle, and another has to make another. Some men are addicted to one kind of sin, while others who are not inclined to that may be inclined to another. Whether it is love of money, or pleasure, or drink, or some other propensity, Christ expects it to be given up. The man must deny himself, that is, he must make the sacrifice. Christ having accepted him, will help him, and will deliver him from evil in any form. The essential condition of acceptance is his being willing to make whatever sacrifice may be required of him. Just as a man in danger of perishing by fire must be willing to leave behind him anything that the fireman tells him he cannot take with him, so the sinner must give up his sin. He cannot be saved in his sins. When he gets to the point that he will give up anything that hinders his salvation, then Christ saves him, and gives him the strength he needs.

Our Weekly Puzzle Competition

Conducted by A. B. R. Open to all Readers of "The Christian Herald"

All Solutions must be sent in on postal cards, and no other business should be mentioned

1. Mail your answer on the Monday following the date of this paper.
2. No communication post-marked before or after this particular Monday will be recognized, hence, in the consideration of solutions and the awarding of prizes, distance plays no part whatever.
3. 250 prizes will be awarded to the first 250 correct answers.
4. In fairness to all, no communications will be examined until ten days after the date of mailing mentioned above.
5. Of course, under these circumstances, only subscribers within the boundaries of the United States proper, and the Dominion of Canada can successfully compete.

6. The names of all who have correctly solved any of the puzzles will be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether they receive a prize or not.

7. The prize for this week's puzzle will be a copy of The Golden Treasury for the Children of God, all charges prepaid.

PUZZLE No. X.

A YOUNG man in the British Museum was transcribing a manuscript written in the strange characters of an Eastern language, and containing some of the books of the New Testament. In response to an inquiry, he said he found the task very difficult, and that while he had no definite purpose in view, he was strongly impelled to use all zeal and perseverance in the effort to acquire a knowledge of this language.

At this time he had made no plans for his life-work. A few years later he consecrated himself to missionary labor, and prayed that God would send him where the difficulties were greatest and most insurmountable. Then he was asked to go to the land for which that study in the British Museum had providentially prepared him. It was his privilege to give the Bible in their own language, to nearly one-third of the human race. The first portion printed was the Acts of the Apostles, which was practically a revision of the manuscript he had studied at home.

Who was this man? To what country did he go, and when?

Swiss Girls to Serve the State
Switzerland is to be the first country in the world where young girls are to serve a term in the service of the state, as young men of other countries are compelled to serve in the army. The Swiss Government is seriously thinking of adopting the plan of a female physician of Zurich, who advocates that all unmarried girls be compelled by the state to work one year in hospitals without any remuneration. She claims that not only would the hospitals be benefited, but that the girls themselves would get a training which would be of great value to them in after life.

VICARIOUS SUFFERING

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

In type and prophecy, the Old Testament foretold the death of Christ; in doctrine and in testimony, the New Testament looks back to it. The cross of Christ is the central point in the world's history, and the central figure in heaven is the Lamb slain, who wakens the praise and adoration of the whole universe. Paul said, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Gal. 6: 14). The deepest shame became the greatest glory, because he who bore it thereby redeemed from everlasting shame and contempt (Dan. 12: 2) every one that believeth.

The apostle John saw a door opened in heaven, and within that door he saw a throne; but the glory of him who sat on it outshone all the glory of the throne; and he heard the wondrous adoration offered to him that sat upon it. A book was in his hand, and an angel challenged all creation to open that book, but none was found able to open it, until the word went forth, "Behold, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the Book, and to loose the seven seals thereof." And then the apostle looked, and saw in the midst of the throne, and all its glory, "a Lamb as it had been slain, and he came, and took the book out of the hand of him that sat upon the throne, and then the four living creatures and the four and twenty elders fell down before him, and cried, Thou art worthy . . . for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood." And then the voice of ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands of angels took up the strain, and said, with a loud voice, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." And then the whole universe woke up to worship; and every creature which is in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, and in the sea, said, "Blessing and honor and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever" (Rev. 4: 5). And this Lamb who was slain is he who "died for our sins, according to the Scriptures!"

It was he in whom was life that died for us; it was he who is the centre of heaven's worship that was put to shame, it was he who knew no sin that was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him (II. Cor. 5: 21). Have we understood what it means that such an One should have espoused our cause, and how base and unpardonable is the sin of rejecting or making light of salvation so dearly bought? How little did Pilate know who it was that he condemned, when, "willing to content the people," he "released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified!"

He was the sin-offering for the world's sin, the yearly sin-offering on the great day of atonement, when the blood was brought within the veil, but the body of the ram was burned without the camp. They crucified him, and parted his garments to fulfil Ps. 22: 18, and he hung on the cross, the world's great sin-offering; proved to be without blemish, for none had convicted him of sin; but bearing on him "the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6), for the Lord had laid it on him. And there, as he hung, he "made intercession for the transgressors" (ver. 12), saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Was there no other way? Must Jesus pass through all this shame, suffering, and insult that he might save us? Yes; for God is holy; he cannot look lightly on sin. God must show his exceeding hatred of sin. In his holy life, Christ was the burnt-offering, always and wholly acceptable; all burnt upon the altar, "an offering and a sacrifice to God as a sweet smelling savor" (Eph. 5: 2). But while representing and bearing in his own body our sin upon the cross, he had to suffer without the gate, as though he were unclean.

The insults of priests and people, "he saved others, himself he cannot save," contained a greater truth than they could conceive. He came into a humanity where the ruling spirit is self-love, to manifest, to teach, and to make possible, a human life which should be unselfish.

The worth of "FORCE" is proved by the number of its imitators.

Of course, it's all very flattering. But I don't mind saying that sometimes I find it hard to be sunny when they claim to be "Just the same as 'FORCE.'"

I hate to see my friends fooled.

Sunny Jim

There is as much potential human energy in a package of "FORCE" as in 3 1/2 pounds of beef-steak, with less than one-third the power (that's the best medical opinion) required to assimilate it.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man whose spine was curved for thirty years. By the use of this invention his spine was straightened. It is nature's own method. It has never yet failed. The old methods of torture are doomed forever. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the marvelous results. Physicians in hospitals and in private practice are endorsing it. The new discovery relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the spinal cord is invigorated and strengthened, the cartilage between the vertebrae expands and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for all, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every state in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Questions & Answers

Correspondents are asked to remember that we cannot examine poetry for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and that we cannot return such MSS. when unsolicited.

Mrs. E., Pine City, Minn. What was the locust spoken of as the meat of John the Baptist?

It was probably the common locust or green grasshopper, which, when prepared and dried, tastes somewhat like a shrimp. Many ancient writers mention them as food. Diodorus Siculus refers to a people of Ethiopia, who were called acridophagi, or locust eaters. Porphyrus says that whole armies have been saved from starvation by eating locusts. Aristotle and Aristophanes assert that they were relished by the Greeks, and Layard, the discoverer, found evidence that they were eaten in a preserved state by the Assyrians. Some commentators have conjectured that the "locust" mentioned in Mark's Gospel as being the food of John the Baptist, was the carob, the fruit of a tree of the locust family, which is a sort of sweetish bean, in pods, much used by the poorer classes.

L. S., Hartford, Ind. I would like to know if the Jews are returning to the promised land, or making preparations to return.

Within a recent period, small colonies of Jews have returned to Palestine and located near Jerusalem. Some of the colonies are self-supporting. Of much deeper significance is the Zionist movement, started by M. Herzl several years ago, which has for its object the general return of the Jews to their ancient home and the rehabilitation of the Jewish State.

J. H. F., Patterson, La. Is there Bible authority for the custom of taking off the hat? What is the origin of the custom?

According to some writers, the raising or taking off the hat as a salutation or sign of respect, is a relic of the ancient custom of taking off the helmet when no danger was nigh. From the most ancient times, the uncovering of the head was a token of subservience, respect and reverence. Among the Hebrews, it was at one time a sign of mourning (See Lev. 10: 6 and 21: 10), although it is not so regarded by that race to-day. In modern times, and among all civilized peoples, the custom is a general one.

Charles A., Shamokin Dam, Pa., sends to the "Mail Bag," an analysis of the contents of an average Sunday newspaper, from which he draws these conclusions:

Some of the matter in the Sunday newspaper is not only objectionable reading for the sacred Sabbath, but is not fit even for the week-day page. None of the subjects I have noted, nor any others like them, should command the attention of anyone, on the day of days given to man for rest, worship, the study of God's truth and growth in spiritual life. It contains very little discussion on religious subjects, making it unworthy the name of Sunday newspaper. It keeps many church members and also the worldly away from the house of God. It teaches the newsboy to break the Sabbath and keeps him away from Sunday School, and debars him from other religious privileges. It instills in young and old a disregard for the Sabbath, which was blessed and hallowed by the Giver of all good.

R. E. P., Campbellsville, Ky. In the expression, "plant your potatoes in the light of the moon," what is intended to be conveyed? Some farmers, talking on the subject, differed, and are anxious to know. Some said it was any hour when the moon was shining, or we were due moonlight; others, that it was when the moon "fulled"; others when it was on the wane.

It is an old superstition and may be traced back to the days of ancient Rome. Columella, Cato, and Pliny each wrote of the advantage of cutting timber at certain ages of the moon. France in its forestry laws, perpetuated the superstition. From forest to farm was an easy transition, and French peasants were soon told to plant "in the wane of the moon," or "with the wind in the north." A similar expression, we believe, is common among the Canadian French, and also in the Southern States, the latter being probably a survival of French occupation.

W. A. C., Shelbyville, Mo. What is meant by the "battle of Armageddon"? Is there any such battle spoken of in the Bible as the scene of the last great battle, and where can I find it?

See Rev. 16: 16. It refers to the mountain and plain of Megiddo, on the west side of Jordan (I. Kings 9: 15). In the language of prophecy, the word mountain represents the Church. Zechariah (12: 11) refers to the same place. Some have translated Armageddon as "the mountain of destruction," others as "the mountain of the Gospel." The plain has already been the scene of many battles, and in describing the last great struggle between the forces of evil and the hosts of righteousness, it was natural that this typical historic battle-ground should have been chosen by the sacred writers, who were familiar with the place and its history.

Mrs. L. G. H., Shingle House, Pa. Are we breaking God's rule when we wear gold in any form?

No. While the wearing of gold and jewels for personal adornment is vanity (See I. Pet. 3: 3; Isa. 3: 21 and other passages), there are many cases that are exceptional, as when one wears a memorial ring or a seal, or such articles as may be of real service, as a watch.

them, and then abandon them, for otherwise valiant ones could not show themselves to be worthy soldiers of the Cross. God will not allow any one to be tempted above that which he is able to bear. However, let us still pray, "Lead us not into temptation," for thereby we may escape many temptations that otherwise we would fall into.

God does not tempt any one. He may permit us to be placed in positions where, if left to our own resources, we would fall; but he does not tempt us to evil. Eve said, "The serpent beguiled me." (See Gen. 3: 1, 4, 5, 13). She yielded in her weakness and suffered accordingly (vs. 14, 15, 16). In Matt. 4: 1, and parallel passages, it is distinctly stated that the devil was the tempter of Jesus.

For Independence Day

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, the Magna-Charta of the English-speaking race, has been removed forever from the people's reverential gaze. It has suffered very seriously from the rough treatment to which it was exposed in the earlier years of the Republic, and has never been on exhibition at any of the great Fairs since the Centennial Exposition. It was returned to the State Department in Washington in 1877, and since then has never been out of the Department Building. For more than two years past it has not been on exhibition, even in the Department. Hereafter, in accordance with a report of a committee of the National Academy of Science, which was appointed to examine the document, it will be kept in the dark, and as dry as possible, and never placed on exhibition.

Beautifully Illustrated Exquisitely Printed...

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, deemed it fitting last year to place within the reach of its every reader a life-sized facsimile of the Declaration, and with it the story of how and by whom it was written, and how given to the world. This book contains a complete history of the great document, biographies and portraits of the signers, and beautiful engravings of famous pictures which illustrate the preparation and adoption of the Declaration. There are illustrations of Carpenters' Hall, where the first Continental Congress met, of Independence Hall, of the historic State House, Philadelphia, of the Liberty Bell, and of many other objects and scenes sacred in American history. There is also "The Story of the Flag," by John Quincy Adams, and a picture of the scene when Betsy Ross first submitted to George Washington and Robert Morris the design for the new flag of the Free and Independent United States. There is also a facsimile of the original draft of the Declaration.

This work is the only one of its kind ever published, and is now almost out of print.

A VERITABLE BARGAIN

Last year we sold nearly 20,000 at 75 cents each, but now to close out the very small lot which we have on hand, we will, upon receipt of 25 cents, send immediately both the life-size facsimile of the Declaration, together with "The Story of the Declaration of Independence," by Henry Mann, and "The History of our Flag," by John Quincy Adams, all fully prepaid—that is, 25 cents for the two. The stock on hand is very small, and the promptest action will be required to take advantage of this bargain. If the supply is exhausted when your order reaches us, we will refund your money at once. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD always refunds the money if the purchaser is not fully satisfied. ADDRESS,

There are also gifts that are tributes of honor, and these are proper to wear on special occasions. It is only the inordinate passion for personal display that is condemned, not the proper use of the precious metals.

J. H., Johnstown, Pa. The translation, "Lead us not into temptation," is correct and in all harmony with Biblical doctrines. "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit," etc. Here the Spirit, which is God, led Jesus into the temptation. Again, "Abandon us not in temptation," is erroneous, for when God created our first parents, he also created a temptation, a delusion, and placed it most conspicuously before them, "to try them." He then abandoned them. He abandoned his Son in the wilderness, as also upon the cross. As the Lord dealt with Adam and Eve and with his Son, so he also deals with all mankind, for "the hour of temptation . . . shall come upon all." So, then, it is God's way to create temptations, to "create strong delusion," and to lead men into them to try

In I. Cor. 10: 13, also, it is made clear that though God may permit us to be tempted, he is not the tempter. See James 1: 13, where it is emphatically asserted that God tempts no man. The withdrawal of the Holy Spirit exposes us to temptation, by leaving the heart open to the attack of the tempter; but nothing is more erroneous than to assume that temptation, or the placing of any agent in man's spiritual path which may cause him to fall, comes from God. If this were true, he would be the author of eternal ruin to multitudes who rush into sin by yielding to temptation. See also Job, 1st and 2d chapters, where Satan is shown as the tempter who pleads to be allowed to test the spiritual stability of the patriarch. The only sources of temptation in any case are the evil spirit, the world and the flesh. Unless we are fortified by the presence of the Divine Spirit, these assail, we are especially exposed liable to fall. See further on the subject 12: 9; John 8: 44; II. Cor. 11: 3; I. John 4: 4; Luke 4: 2; Acts 5: 3; Matt. 26: 68. Even when God has made a trial of our faith, he has done so in every instance by removal of spiritual safeguards and leaving man to his own resources, when the tempter availed himself of the opportunity. In this sense, it is evident that a test is not a temptation.

J. R., Lexington, Ky. I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for upward of twenty years, and have always greatly appreciated its unequalled premium proposition. When the offer of a slightly damaged set of the Crown Encyclopedia at $1, and 50 cents for expressage was made, I overlooked it. Will you send me a set now if I remit the money or am I too late?

You are rather late; but we will treat you as we have treated others, by sending you new books, instead of the damaged ones, which are now exhausted. See the notice on our editorial page of this issue.

B. N., Cincinnati, O. Where was the phrase, "The mills of the gods grind slowly," first used, and by whom?

In the modern sense it first appeared in a poem entitled Retribution, by F. Von Lilius (1614-1655); but Rev. Bernard Pick is authority for the statement that it is found in the Eighth Book of the famous Sibylline Oracles, the exact words being, "The mills of God grind slowly."

L., St. Louis, Mo. What is meant by the "mystic white stone," mentioned in the following verse, taken out of the poem:

I want to be marked for thy own—
Thy seal on my forehead to wear;
To receive that new name on the mystic white stone,
Which none but thyself can declare?

See Revelation 2: 17. The "white stone" is a glistening diamond—the Urim—born of the high priest within the choschen or breastplate of judgment, with the names of the twelve tribes thereon. Urim, means light or white. The verse is a paraphrase of the passage in Revelations:

Mrs. A. J. T., Somerset, Pa. Is it wrong for a sinner to pray the prayer, "Our Father, who art in heaven?"

No. All are sinners, differing only in degree; and when one comes, repentant, asking forgiveness, the prayer is natural and appropriate. It would be mockery, however, in the lips of the unrepentant.

Mrs. E. M. M., Windsor, Fla. If Adam was a first man created, why does God command him to replenish the earth?

It means simply to populate and occupy the earth, and to subdue all things therein, man's dominion, as God intended.

Heroism on the Thibetan Border

A THIBETAN COPPER IDOL

IT is now virtually admitted that Great Britain is at war with Thibet. Colonel Younghusband's expedition, which, at the outset, was represented to be a peaceful diplomatic mission, has been forced by events which may or may not have been avoidable, to assume the character of an armed invasion. Several encounters have taken place between the expeditionary troops and the natives, and many lives have already been sacrificed. At latest accounts, the expedition was at Gyantse, where it was awaiting reinforcements, in order to push on to Lhasa, the capital. An uprising of the Thibetans in force against the expedition is expected, and unless some basis for negotiations can be arrived at, a long and sanguinary struggle would seem to be inevitable. But there is another campaign going on in Thibet, which possesses a deeper significance for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than Colonel Younghusband's military operations. Not with sword and cannon, but with the Word of Life, and with hearts overflowing with love and brotherly kindness, a Gospel band stands knocking at the gates of Thibet. For many years a cordon of brave Christian missionaries has been drawing its lines closer and closer to the borders of "the Sealed Land," awaiting for the propitious moment to carry the Word of Life to its benighted people. From two of these missionaries, this journal has received letters full of hope and encouragement. One of the writers, Mr. Ernest Shawe, of the Moravian Mission at Leh, in western Thibet, has forwarded, with his brief communication, a number of photographs, which are probably the first illustrations from that strange and far-away quarter of the world that have ever appeared in an American publication. They are presented on this page. One of the photographs shows a typical Ladak village of western Thibet, with a monastery in the background. In another, a group of Thibetan lamas or priests are seen reading the sacred books "for the good of the country." Mr. Shawe explains that the object is to read as much as possible, and the loose leaves of the books are divided among the lamas, and all read simultaneously. In the photograph of the town of Leh—the mission headquarters—is seen the old palace of the former kings of Ladak, an ancient-looking and somewhat extensive building in the rear. The other pictures show types of this long-isolated people, who seem destined shortly to become better known to the world.

Mr. Shawe writes:

Leh, from where I write, is the capital of the province of Ladak, which is now under the rule of the Maharajah of Kashmir; but as the Ladakis are Thibetan by race, religion and language, it is quite fair to count the Moravian Mission

Western Himalayas, the two former being Kyelang in 1856, and Poo in 1865. Now there are seven stations and out-stations belonging to our Church in this mission field.

The town of Leh is not a large one, according to our ideas. The population consists of only about 2,500, but still it is the largest town for hundreds of miles around, and as it is the meeting-place for traders from all parts of Central Asia to India, it has an importance far beyond its size. In the trading season (August to October) the population becomes doubled or trebled; and in the bazaar, people from Turkistan jostle those from India and Kashmir, and traders from Afghanistan bargain with traders from Lhasa, and one may hear six or eight languages or dialects spoken in as many minutes. This increases the difficulty of mission work, especially medical mission work, but our preaching is done in the Ladaki dialect of Thibetan.

The Ladakis, like other Thibetans, are "Lamaists" (demon worshippers), with a thin veneer of Buddhist ideas and ceremonial. About Buddha and his teaching they really know very little. Work among them is slow and difficult, and there is often much opposition, generally secret, from the lamas or priests. Still the sowing of the seed has not been in vain, and now there are nearly forty Christians in Leh. Thibetan gospels and tracts have been widely distributed, and in many cases have done their silent work in human hearts.

The great peculiarity in the costume of the Ladakis is the head-dress worn by the women. This consists of a strip of red cloth, on which turquoises and silver ornaments are sewn. From either side of the head project great ear-flaps of lambskin, or, in the case of wealthy ladies, of sable. The value of such a head-dress may be several hundred rupees, and the wealth of a woman is known by the number of turquoises and ornaments she has. The Ladakis are generally lively and good-natured, and, compared with many other Asiatics, easy to get on with. Pray God that their hearts may be more easily opened to the Gospel.

Our other correspondent, the Rev. James Johnston, A. T. S., writes as follows of the work of the missionaries:

"Since 1856, the Moravian missionaries have vainly endeavored to penetrate the loftiest mountain passes and sterile wastes, for the evangelization of the Hermit Nation. In the wild and picturesque provinces of British India, bordering on the Western Himalayas, their record of 'working and waiting,' has perennial charm. To strike a blow at the stronghold of Buddhism they have left no stone unturned, and as one of their number writes, 'any missionary working on the borders of the Great Closed Land, Leh is probably the highest mission station in the world, being 11,600 feet above sea level. This great altitude is very trying for Europeans, and some travelers have died from the effects of the rarefied air. The Moravian Mission was first permanently established here in 1885, but already ten graves of missionaries and their children are to be found in the little graveyard by the side of the desert. Leh was the third mission station to be started by the Moravian Church in the

What is Personal Salvation?

A Sermon by Rev. CHARLES M. SHELDON, of Topeka, Kans.*

REV. CHAS. M. SHELDON

BEING saved is the most practical of all things in the world, and the fact itself is one of the plainest and most real things in the universe. There is no reason whatever that any one should be confused or in doubt concerning what it means to be a Christian, or to be saved, any more than that a person should be confused, or remain in doubt, concerning his every-day physical habits, or the use of his hands and feet, or the exercise of any of his mental faculties. Science itself, which often arrogantly boasts of being exact, is in reality far less sure of its ground than religion. For example, twenty-five years ago my text-book in physics taught me as a fact that air is a viewless gas, but to-day the professor in the chemical laboratory throws a chunk of liquid air down on the table as a boy would throw a ball, plainly visible. A few years ago my text-book said light traveled at the rate of so many thousand miles a second, but to-day the scientist says some kinds of light, especially those that have what is called radio-activity, travel inconceivably faster than this. Practical science is to-day confused and doubtful concerning the very plainest elements in the air, light, and water. The surest ground we have to-day is not in the realm of science, but in the realm of Christian faith, where the laws of the spiritual kingdom remain as good to-day as they were two thousand years ago, so that the first statement we are able to make about salvation is this: The way of salvation for the individual is absolutely plain. Unless a man is a fool, or idiotic, or absolutely determined not to know the way of salvation, he can know it more readily than he can know any scientific fact. The Bible even states very dogmatically that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.

What it is to Believe

Salvation for the individual starts with belief in Christ. And any man can believe in Christ who is able to believe in anything that is good and true and loving, for Christ is all of these more than any person that ever lived. The Anglo-Saxon definition of belief is, rightly, "to hold dear or valuable." It does not consist in a theoretical assent to Jesus' good, true, and loving life, but it consists in a practical obedience to his life and teaching because we love him. No man, therefore, has faith in Christ or believes in him unless he is loving him, and if he wants to do that, he can do it. The stumbling block for any man who is not living the Christian life is not in any difficulty which surrounds the matter of salvation, but it is in the man's own perverseness of will. "If any man will do the will of the Father, he shall know of the teaching," is the plain statement of Christ himself. And if any man cannot believe in the best, the wisest, the truest, and most loving Person that ever lived, then I do not see how he can believe in anything in the universe. Yet we have very often the absurdity of men claiming to believe the statements of science in the physical world, while the whole subject is at the present moment in great uncertainty, who claim they cannot believe in Jesus Christ. It is not a matter of intellect. It is a matter of the will. As Jesus said, "They will not come unto me that they might have eternal life." It is as easy to start to be a Christian, if one wants to love the best things in the world, as it is to eat a good meal if one is hungry.

Starting with this essential basis of belief in Christ, there are a number of practical things which any one who wishes to be saved can begin to do, and that belong to the life which we call Christian.

The Kingdom of God First

The man who is saved, has a certain object in life which marks him as distinct from the man of the world. The saved man is not simply a good moral man, but he is a man whose one continual first object in life is not to make money and build up a business, or get fame, or win success, but his first and greatest object is to do the will of God. Jesus said: "Ye are my disciples, if ye do whatsoever I command you;" and among the things that he commanded was this: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." The first text of the first sermon preached by John, was "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The first sermon preached by Christ, as he entered on his public career, was from the same text. The kingdom of God was continually emphasized by Jesus as the essential centre of every saved life. A man can tell whether he is a Christian or not, by this test. If he loves money more than doing right, if he worships any idol in society, in politics,

* In a sermon published in this journal on April 20, Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, of Topeka, Kan., showed what salvation meant to a community or a nation. In this sermon he shows what it means to the individual. The text is, Acts 16: 30, 31: "What must I do to be saved? And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

business, or even in his own home, he cannot call himself a Christian; for the saved man is one whose greatest purpose in all of his life from beginning to end, is to do all that is in his power to establish the kingdom of God in the world.

Practice the Brotherhood

If the individual is really saved, he is doing his utmost to preach and practice the brotherhood of mankind. In other words, he is attempting to do what Jesus commanded, and Jesus commanded his disciples to call no man master: "For all ye," he said, "are brethren;" and he also taught the essential of love to one another which, if carried out in practice, as he intended it should be, would do away with war. In other words, the saved man is living in such a way as to utter his constant living protest against the rule of force, and for the establishment of

The Reign of Peace

In a recent statement made in the Senate, by Mr. Carmack, of Tennessee, the expense of war in the United States from 1898 to 1903, was over $900,000,000, and the cost of passive war and warfare, that is, the maintenance of our standing army and navy, is over $2 per head, assessed on 82,000,000 people, that is, over $160,000,000. It is estimated that before the 30th of June this year, the total cost of war for the last seven years is a round billion of dollars. If, as the statement says, the tax-gatherer went to the door of every house and demanded two dollars a head, or ten dollars from each family to maintain war expenses, how long would this waste of warfare and militarism last? It is because the taxation is indirect, that the people do not make more protest. But all this wastefulness on the part of every nation and republic in the wide world, is contrary to

The Plain Teaching of Jesus

A battleship which, with its magnificent equipment, costs over five million dollars, is spoiled at one blow of a torpedo or submarine mine in a war which is carried on for selfish purposes, and every Christian on the face of the globe is bound to register his protest in every way possible against this horrible barbarity.

I do not see how a Christian citizen of America can sing the song, "The Army and Navy Forever." If there is anything we do not want to last forever, it is the army and navy, and it ought to be the prayer, and it is the desire and prayer of every person who claims to be saved, that the time may speedily come when the army and navy shall be no more a horrible fact and a dreadful economic waste to the entire civilized world. In the promotion of the brotherhood, in the exercise of the practical love of man for man is the only hope of abolishing this nightmare of the ages. The spectacle of the world after two thousand years of Jesus priding itself in its weapons of destruction, and gloating over its newest inventions in the matter of engines of murder at wholesale, is entirely contrary in every particular to the commands of Christ. The saved man cannot express the fact of his salvation to the world fully, unless, in some way or other, he utters his tremendous protest against this wrong of the centuries.

Share in Great Reforms

Individual salvation means a personal participation in the great struggle of the world for better things. The Christian, of all persons in the world, cannot sit down comfortably in his home, put on his slippers when evening comes, and enjoy his selfish culture by the fire-side while the great city in which he lives is surging with crime and boodle, bribery and drunkenness and vice of all sorts. He must, if he calls himself a Christian, be doing his share to make the life around him better. He has no claim to call himself a saved man if he simply spends his leisure in singing hymns of praise to God for salvation. The world cannot tell the difference between itself and the kingdom of God unless it sees the difference in the conduct of the disciples of Christ from the men of the world, and one of the places where this difference can be seen in the most marked fashion is in the conduct of the citizen of to-day who bears his part of the great civic burden and does his share of the disagreeable cross-bearing.

The Child and the Kingdom

The saved individual may also bear witness to the world of his salvation, and be conscious of it himself, by his recognition of the rights and value of childhood. As it is a test of the salvation of life, to know that the kingdom of God is the first object of a man's passion, so it is also another test if he has a genuine thought of the childhood of the race, and sees in that the possibility of the future regeneration of the globe. I might ask without any fear of a doubtful answer, "Am I a Christian? How can I know?" I know by the fact that I realize that I cannot enter the kingdom myself, except as I come in as a little child. Pride, vainglory, exaltation of my selfishness in the presence of God's holiness—these things must all be taken away. And then, if I am conscious that I have entered in this fashion, I wish also to be conscious of the fact that my thought of children in the world, is a thought of reverence, of love, and of hopefulness, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

The Union of Christendom

Individual salvation means not simply members in some church, but it means also that spirit of discipleship which longs for the real union of all the disciples of Christ. In other words, salvation is not simply narrow sectarian consciousness of a fellowship with other minds of the same kind; but with real salvation also goes some broader conception of the kind of family of disciples, and a desire that all of Christ's disciples shall unite in the common purpose to build his kingdom. It is inconceivable that the redemption which Christ brought to the world, should leave the world a narrow definition of so great a thing as salvation. To be a Christian is infinitely greater than to be a denominationalist, and if there are degrees of salvation, as it is quite possible to believe there may be, the highest degree of the fullest salvation always carries with it the thought of a discipleship which is worldwide. If I am really saved, I am willing and eager to do all I can to unite all the good of the world against all the evil of the world, and that is the real union of Christendom which, when it is accomplished, is nothing more nor less than the practical getting together of the Christian life in distinct and unequivocal opposition to everything that is hostile to God and his kingdom.

Optimism

Individual salvation means always hopefulness. Christian cannot be a pessimist. It is a contradiction of terms to speak of a hopeless Christian. No man really saved who does not believe in the tremendous victory of good over evil. Individual salvation carries with it that buoyant hopefulness concerning one's own condition for the present and the future, and also the same overmastering hopefulness for the entire world. To yield for one moment to the assertion of the world that things are growing worse, to accept the sophist that the devil is triumphant for any length of time, to humiliate the dignity of Christ's kingdom by placing it in a secondary or third place, in comparison with wealth or place or power—all this is contrary to the true thought of redemption. If I am saved, I am the most hopeful being in the world. I cannot believe that things are growing worse. I cannot have fear concerning the triumph of the truth. I cannot be afraid of either man or devil. But my individual salvation means the peace of God within—peace even in the midst of conflict, because I am sure of ultimate victory which leads to another fact concerning individual salvation.

"As it is in heaven"

A firm belief in the final establishment of this kingdom of God, for which we pray every time we utter the Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." To pray this prayer continually, and at the same time have a lurking lack of faith in the heart that it may never be accomplished, is, seems to me, the height of distrust in God, and I cannot understand how Christ could teach this prayer to his disciples, expecting them to always distrust the practical bringing to pass of the prayer which they pray. And if a person is really saved, it seems to me he will ask himself concerning every act of life, "Would I do this if I were in heaven? I pray 'Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.' Now then, if I were actually in heaven, would I do this thing that I am going to do? Would I hate my brother? Would I make money-making my first object in heaven? Would I hurrah for battleships and armies and navies in heaven if I were there? Would I glorify brute force if I were in heaven? Would I magnify the physical over against the spiritual if I were in heaven? Would I practice anything selfish or vainglorious if I were in heaven? If not, why should I do the same thing here on earth, if my prayer really is, 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven?'"

All these manifestations of a saved life which we have mentioned: seeking first the kingdom of God, the promotion of the brotherhood, a definite share in great reforms, a faith in childhood as the germ of the kingdom, the struggle to establish the union of Christendom, the spirit of optimism in the daily conflict, and faith in the final establishment of the kingdom on the earth, are all of them simple manifestations of one supreme fact, viz., that the saved life is the life which is continually living in obedience to the will of God. In other words, full salvation is a complete merging of man's will with God's will.

The Paramount Desire

The life that is in harmony at every point with God's will is a saved life. If at any point in my conduct I am obliged to say, "In this experience I am not in accordance with the will of God," then at that point I am not a saved man. If in any experience of life, any experience in business, in politics, in amusements, in

N. H. PERDICARIS

Kidnapped in Morocco

VERY serious trouble has arisen between the United States and Morocco, over the kidnapping by Moorish bandits of Mr. Ion Hanford Perdicaris, a natural-born American citizen, resident in Tangier. According to the cable reports, the capture was plotted and carried out by Raisuli, a noted bandit leader. Cromwell Varley, Mr. Perdicaris' stepson and an English subject, was abducted at the same time. Raisuli had on more than one occasion enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. Perdicaris, who is a man of great wealth, a famous entertainer, and the owner of a palatial home, which was formerly one of the Sultan's palaces. Raisuli is holding his principal captive for ransom, and has demanded a large sum, failure to pay which may mean death to the abducted men. The fact that Mr. Perdicaris is an American, and that numerous influential friends, also Americans, are making every possible effort for his release, has had the effect of arousing the State Department to vigorous action. The British Government has also taken action in behalf of its subject, Mr. Varley. If Mr. Perdicaris and his stepson are not promptly liberated, two full squadrons of American warships may be sent to Tangier under orders to make a display of force. The South Atlantic Squadron, consisting of three ships, the Brooklyn, Maryland, and Castine, commanded by Rear Admiral Chadwick, which is due at the Canary Islands, will be ordered to Tangier, if the prisoners are not set at liberty. Rear Admiral Jewell in command of the European squadron, when he reaches the Azores, will be ordered to join Admiral Chadwick at Tangier, and if the occasion demands, the battleship fleet will be sent to Morocco. Should the prisoners be released before the arrival of the warships, their coming will have a good moral effect, as showing the determination of the United States Government to protect its citizens, and if necessary to support its demands by force. The Moroccan Government will be brought to a sense of its responsibility. Consul-General Gummere cabled to the State Department that the bandit chief Raisuli had told the Moorish authorities at Tangier that the prisoners are held for ransom, but the amount demanded was not stated. The captives are believed to be confined somewhere in the mountains. In all probability they are kept on the move, so as to baffle pursuit. Consul-General Gummere reports that he expects that Raisuli will soon make his demands definite, in order to close negotiations. Although the Consul-General believes the Moorish authorities are acting in good faith, and will pay the ransom demanded, he adds that the presence of a few war vessels will have an excellent effect, spurring the Sultan to speedy action. The Shereef of Wagan, the most important Moslem ecclesiastic in North Africa, is to meet Raisuli the half. I do not know what demands Raisuli is making, but he asks nothing personally of us, and my own private impression is that he wishes to make it a purely political business, and means that no harm shall come to us." Mr. Perdicaris adds that he and his stepson are confined in one room, and only allowed out a short time in the evening.

Mr. Ion H. Perdicaris was born in Trenton, N. J., where his father, then a refugee from Greece, had settled and built up a competency. Later in life, the father traveled extensively, finally purchasing one of the Sultan's palaces in Tangier, where he wished to end his days. The elder Perdicaris married an American lady, so that his son Ion is American born and Greek only by race, his father being a naturalized, and his mother a native-born, American.

Assuming that there is nothing behind the action and demands of the bandits, more than has been stated by Mr. Perdicaris, (i.e. a demand for a ransom), two points may be considered as practically settled: One is that the United States will do well to secure redress, to prevent such outrages in the future, although it is not necessary to needlessly affront the Sultan, who seems well disposed and in favor of progress. The other point is that this affair offers a long-sought opportunity for Christendom to interfere, in such an energetic manner that such high-handed outrages will be stopped once for all. It is hoped that Mr. Perdicaris and his companion Mr. Varley, may be none the worse for their sojourn in the wild fastnesses of the Atlas Mountains; and it is also to be hoped that there will be no unnecessary delay in teaching the Sultan, and the men in authority under him, that the trade of kidnapping and the bandit business, should be abandoned at once, as far as it applies to people born under the protection of the American flag.

bandit chief. Mohammed El Torres, Foreign Minister and representative of the Sultan of Morocco at Tangier, has empowered the Shereef to say that the Government will grant all the demands of Raisuli if Perdicaris and Varley are immediately released. A newspaper correspondent in Morocco has received communications from both Mr. Perdicaris and his captor Raisuli. Mr. Perdicaris writes: "We are both in good health. Raisuli does his best for us. It is very encouraging to know that you and other friends are acting on our be-creations, in human ambitions and affections, in desires and trouble, in sorrow—at all these different points of human experience I find myself fully in harmony with the will of God concerning me, then I have right to say that I am a saved man. My greatest desire is to do his will. My meat and drink is to have righteousness. My greatest passion is to love and love him supremely. The whole man in every centre of his activity must feel the thrill of the harmony of his life and purpose with that of God. This is to be saved. How shall I know that I am saved? What is it to be a Christian? It is to have heart, will, affections, and soul, body, all in accordance with the will of God. And the will of God can be known by any human being who desires to know it. The avenue of approach to God is unencumbered. The soul can go direct to him for enlightenment. If there is any doubt concerning the course of action, He who is all light and all wisdom will give the soul what it needs: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Salvation is not simply feeling something mysterious that stirs the emotions for a little while, but it is the supreme event of a whole life and carries with it the entire reconstruction of the soul along the lines of conformity to God and his great purpose. The Christian is the greatest being in the world. He is far more than simply a good man. Salvation is in its fullest definition the whole man, every part of his human energy devoted to the carrying out of the prime will of God in the establishment of his earthly kingdom and in the doing of his will in earth as it is in heaven. It is not simply being saved for a future heaven; it is being redeemed for the establishment of God's kingdom here and the enjoyment of it hereafter. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." To know God, to love him, to love to do his will, to find one's highest happiness in living in companionship with him, this is salvation. This is to be saved, both now and for the world to come.

SEVERAL weeks ago, anxiety was expressed in certain quarters concerning the safety of our missionaries in Korea. Although THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated at that time that they were not in imminent danger—the real field of military operations having been moved northward—we communicated with the missionaries themselves, in order that our readers might have authentic information on the subject.

Several of the missionaries have replied, assuring us that there is not now, nor has there been at any time since the war began, any serious apprehension of trouble or danger to the missionaries, their wives and families. Rev. Elmer M. Cable, Presiding Elder, M. E. Church, Chemulpo, writes under date of April 2:

"I am aware that all kinds of disquieting rumors are afloat as to the safety of the missionary body. Up to the present, not one of the missionary body in all Korea has suffered any violence from either of the contending armies, and at no time have their lives been in jeopardy. The safety of the women and children in the north was thoroughly considered by the American Minister. Thanks to his thoughtfulness and wise judgment, provision was made for their transfer to places of safety in case it became necessary. Conditions have so changed now that it does not seem necessary for the missionaries to leave their work, and as yet none of the stations have been deserted. The American Minister has asked that no women travel in the interior, and a few of the women and children from the interior stations have come to Seoul, but none of the stations have been entirely abandoned. The outbreak of the war has augmented rather than handicapped mission work, and I think there was never a more fertile period in the history of missionary enterprise in Korea than at present.

It is true that the work in the northern part of the Empire has suffered not a little, being right in the line of march of the contending armies. The Christians, many of them, have fled from their homes in fear of the soldiers, and thus many of the little groups have been broken into, and perhaps some have been altogether destroyed. However, the missionaries in charge are following up those who have fled from their homes, comforting and inducing them to return.

From Seoul, the captive, Missionary S. F. Moore, writes (April 12) that:

The war has not caused us any serious inconvenience here in the capital. It was feared that battles might be fought near Pyeng-

Missionaries and the War

Yang, and arrangements were made to move the women and children of that station to this city;

but now that the Japanese forces have advanced, there would seem to be no good reason for the Pyeng-Yang missionaries to leave their homes. If the Japanese should meet with disaster in Manchuria, and be compelled to retire to Korea, the northern part of the peninsula would become a battle-ground, and our missionaries would have to leave; but we hope this may not be. Medical and evangelistic work goes on as usual. The attendance and attention at street chapel meetings in the city, or wherever the Gospel is proclaimed in villages, or by the wayside, is unusual, and in some districts the people have been coming into the Christian chapels in unusual numbers, declaring that they wish to become Christians. I am glad, therefore, to have this opportunity to request the many readers of your paper to make special intercession for the Korean church. There is said to be unusual interest, amounting to a revival, in the work of the M. E. Mission in the district south of Seoul. I have recently returned from the Pai Chun circuit, a hundred miles northwest of Seoul. Thirty-nine leading men from eighteen villages gathered to spend ten days in Bible study, all providing their own expenses. A Bible woman from Seoul conducted a woman's class at the same time, and of the twenty-five women in attendance, thirteen had learned to read since believing. Mr. Yu, the new helper, has spent some time at the village Kijung Ju, where work began only a few months ago, and there are now forty-eight souls there who call themselves Christians.

Blessings often come in strange disguises. One result of India's famine was the turning of multitudes from their idols to Christ. If Korea, now suffering and humiliated by the war, should turn in her distress to the true God, the source of all help and blessing, the ordeal through which that ancient land is now passing, would be remembered by future generations as the spiritual turning-point of the nation. Certainly the confident and inspiring letters of our missionaries would seem to justify such a hope.

Ten Years of Helpful Work

It is ten years since I subscribed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have found it very helpful, and have had my sympathies enlarged, and my horizon broadened very much by its beautiful, inspiring pages, and truly can say that it grows better and better every year. MRS. IONE E. C. Terryville, Conn.

Our Pilgrims' Convention Ended

By MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, Our Special Correspondent

AFTER the opening address in the World's Sunday School Convention at Jerusalem (which was described in my letter last week), the Hon. Selah Merrill, United States Consul, made a brief speech of welcome. He said that the delegates had come in such numbers, that not showers, but deluges of blessing might be expected. The Americans felt they were receiving double welcome, for they had already been present at a delightful reception given by Dr. and Mrs. Merrill.

Responses to these addresses were made as follows, each one being limited to three minutes:

America, Rev. John Potts, D.D., Toronto, Can.; England, Dr. Monroe Gibson, London; Canada, Rev. Wm. Frizzell, Toronto, Can.; United States, Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.; India, Rev. Richard Burgess, Calcutta; Samaria, Jacob, son of Joseph, Samaritan High Priest; Egypt, Rev. Chauncey Murch, Luxor; Bulgaria, Rev. J. F. Clark, Samokov; Trinidad, Rev. W. Scott Whittier, D.D., Port of Spain; Mexico, Rev. J. G. Dale, Rio Verde; Japan, Miss Frances Phelps, Sendai; Persia, Mrs. Margaret W. Dean, Urmia; Nova Scotia, Rev. Jacob Laton, Truro; World Tour, Dr. John B. Devins, New York, U. S. A.; Colored Work, Dr. W. S. Brooks, D.D., Chicago, Ill.; Indian Work, Rev. A. L. Riggs, Santee, Neb.

Dr. Monroe Gibson repeated the remark of a blind woman, who, on coming out of the tent after the communion service, had said: "Heaven has seemed nearer to me than ever before—even as if it were opened, and Jesus himself looking down upon us."

Dr. Frizzell, of Canada, said: "Canada is large in resources, large in Christian work, but we would serve our Master more, and we have come here to get a larger inspiration."

Mr. W. N. Hartshorn spoke of the interest Presidents of the United States have felt in the religious education of the young, notably Washington, Lincoln, Grant and Roosevelt.

Rev. Richard Burgess, Sunday School Secretary of India, spoke of the great banyan tree in India, which is at least one hundred years old. With this he compared the great Sunday School work in India, commenced about one hundred years ago, by the planting of a Sunday School seed by the Carey Brothers and John Fernandez, when thirty children were gathered together, and a Sunday School organized. He said that the Sunday School banyan tree had grown so that he could now travel about it in one year.

Jacob, son of Joseph, Samaritan High Priest, said he represented the smallest and most ancient of denominations, and that he believed the coming together of this great World's Convention, was a fulfilment of the prophecy contained in Deut. 32:4. He spoke through an interpreter, Rev. J. E. Hanauer, a Jewish gentleman of Jerusalem. And so the Samaritans and the Jews have come to have dealings with each other in these latter days.

Rev. Chauncey Murch, of Luxor, Egypt, spoke of thirteen thousand children in Egypt, in the day schools and Sunday Schools connected with the American Mission, and expressed the hope that their number might be increased.

Miss Frances Phelps, spoke of Japan as a paradise for Sunday School work, because of the great appreciation of childhood in that land, and the desire of the people to make children happy.

Mrs. Margaret W. Dean, of Persia, said that in hundreds of churches there, Sunday Schools are held every week.

Dr. John B. Devins spoke of Sunday School and Missionary work in the Philippines, and in Korea. In the latter place, the Sunday School is called "The Bible Hour," because it represents persons of all ages engaged in the study of God's Book.

The regular sessions of the Convention began on Monday morning, at 9 A.M. The devotional exercises were led by Mr. F. H. Jacobs. Then followed the organization of the Convention. Mr. E. K. Warren was unanimously chosen President of the Convention. He thanked the members and briefly said: "The Gospel has been preached to the uttermost parts of the earth, and we of the uttermost parts of the earth have come together to this place, where Jesus gave the command to go into all the world to preach the Gospel, in order that we may learn how to do it better."

The first address of the morning was made by Dr. Monroe Gibson, of London, subject: "The Geographical and Historical Basis of Divine Revelation." He referred to a column in the church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is claimed to be the centre of the world. He also spoke of a classical map he had seen, which makes Jerusalem the centre of the world. Conquests alter the balance of power, but the Holy Land is still the centre. The rocky ridge which runs through it is a mighty rostrum to reach the people of the world. "O earth, earth! hear ye the word of the Lord." The Jordan is before all rivers of the world, and so Namaan would agree, after he was washed in it. Those who dwell in Palestine were a feeble people, and had a brief record of greatness, but they produced men with whom the men of Greece cannot be compared. Leave Palestine in the ship, all the way to Rome, try to put yourself in place of Paul, consider what it was then, without wealth and prestige, for four men to plant the standard of the Cross over the lands, and then say if it is to be explained in any other way than as a part of the principle, "Lo, I am with you always."

Prof. L. B. Paton, of Hartford, Conn., gave an address on "Jerusalem in Old Testament Times." He took exception to the location modern scholarship has given Mount Zion, on the west side of the Tyropean Valley. He says it was on the east side, that by "Zion" was meant the whole of the east side, and that the temple was built on Mount Zion, that what was called "Zion," was really Jerusalem itself.

An interesting Oriental Conference was conducted by Dr. Ghosn el Howie, of Mt. Lebanon. Being blind, he was accompanied by his young daughter, Ruby. Both were richly dressed in Oriental style. The salting of new-born children was explained. To be salted by being laid on a pile of salt, and having it rubbed well in a day or two after birth, is to be given the right sort of a start in life. The seal also was explained by Dr. Howie. When a seal is attached to a bill showing payment received, and attested by living witnesses, it can not be broken. The Christian has been sealed by the Spirit. John is the witness that God is true and His Word abides forever.

Rev. George W. Mackie, Professor of Oriental studies in the Protestant Syrian College, at Beyrout, gave a fine address on the "Customs of Syria illustrating the Bible."

The next session of the Convention was on Monday evening, and was opened by a devotional and musical service, in which persons were asked to repeat texts of Scripture suggested by what had been seen in Palestine. So ready were the responses it seemed as though the whole Bible was at the tongue's end of the delegates. There were four addresses at this session:

"The Work in Great Britain," by Rev. Frank Johnson, in which was mentioned the great London Sunday School Union, the Teacher's College, and the International Daily Bible Reading Association.

Mrs. Mary F. Bryner, spoke of the work in America. She described the different departments of work, told of the one hundred field workers, the system of conventions, 1,500 having been held last year, and the summer schools and teachers' conferences.

The work in India was presented fully by Rev.

Richard Burgess. He stated that the India Sunday School Association was organized in 1876. The object of the association was to emphasize spiritual truth, extend Sunday School work, educate teachers, produce suitable literature, encourage special services, and unite all Asia in Sunday School Work.

Rev. J. P. McNaughton spoke of Sunday School work in Turkey. Throughout Turkey the International Sunday School lessons are taught by Greeks, Armenians, and Turkish people, and in the mission schools a Bible lesson is given every day in the year. There are about 40,000 Sunday School scholars, among whom are 25,000 of the choicest young men and women of Turkey, who will change the tone of the home life.

The last address of the evening was on "Childhood—the Hope of the World," by Mr. Marion Lawrence, International General Secretary. He said the hope of the world's redemption was ushered in by the coming of a Child, and the Child has been in the midst ever since. Childhood is the key that is to unlock the problems ahead of us. The Sunday School is the factor of good citizenship. Children should be taught to see the world as Jesus sees it.

The last day's session was held on April 18, Mrs. Laura Winston of North Carolina, Vice-President, in the chair. The first address was on Missionary Work in and about Jerusalem, by Rev. J. Carnegie Brown. There are the Bishop's Mission to Bible Lands, for the Jews, which is mainly educational, consisting chiefly of schools for boys in Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Ramleh; the German work, consisting of Schneller's Orphanage of three hundred boys; also a Kaisersworth institution, a hospital, and a school at Bethlehem, and the flourishing German Church at Jerusalem, which Emperor William came to dedicate two years ago. There are also the Christian Alliance, with branches at Jaffa, Hebron, etc.; the Scotch Mission; and the Friends' Mission at Ramleh, with which there is a training school for teachers. There are many independent Missions. The speaker said he was connected with a Society organized seventy years ago, to reach the Jews. Between six and seven hundred Jews had been baptized as Christians, and sent into every part of the world as teachers. What did God think of the Jews? He took upon himself the form of a Jew. What do you think of

What do your Sunday School scholars know about the Jews from your lips?

"The Power of God's Word," was the subject of an address by Rev. J. E. Hanover, Jerusalem. Then followed a Conference, conducted by Rev. Chauncey Church of Egypt, on the topic: "So I am with you way," in which missionaries from many lands participated, giving testimony showing how they had been sustained by God's providence in health, and in relation to the governments of the lands where they were working.

"The Sunday School's Place in the Kingdom," was the subject of a Conference conducted by Mr. W. B. Jacobs of Chicago. Mr. Jacobs said: "Children will come to Jesus if not prevented. They are prevented by the attitude and neglect of the Church, and by the failure of teachers to act. When they are encouraged, helped and loved, Sunday School scholars are eager to come into the Church. When we consider our Master's assurance that it is his will that not one of these little ones should perish, we think he meant the little ones in our own family or nation, but he really meant as well the children in Jerusalem, in Syria, in Africa, in Asia—every child in the world."

Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts was then introduced to the convention as the Superintendent of the Sunday School department of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union. She spoke about the relation of the Sunday School to temperance teaching. She said that strong drink has a grip on the throat of the world. It is the monster evil of the ages. It is responsible for at least nine-tenths of all crime. It is crushing home life. It is wasting resources. It is the greatest foe to missions. (The speaker represented the grip by tightly losing the left hand.) What can undo the grip? The fingers of the right hand were taken to represent the Jewish Church, the Greek Church, the Roman Catholic Church, the Christian Church (the Sunday School cruise was called "The Christian Church afloat," and it was stated that the tables on the ship were white from end to end, not disfigured by wine). The thumb was taken to represent the Moslem people, through whose influence millions have been kept from learning the taste of strong drink; these forces working together can undo the grip of strong drink. And let it be done through God's plan of instructing the children. And this the work of the Sunday Schools of all nations to-day, for temperance is a world question.

The last meeting was held on Tuesday evening. The tent was filled to its utmost capacity by Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, Greeks, etc. On the platform sat the Turkish Commissioner of Education and press censor. He was introduced to the Convention and spoke a few kindly words. A general of King Menelek of Abyssinia, in his "glad clothes" was also introduced. He made a brief address through an interpreter, in which he said: "The Bible is to be the light of the world." He said he had become a Christian under Coptic influence.

There was also introduced Youssel Zia Pacha Alkalidi, Ancient Mayor of Jerusalem. He made one remark in English: "We thought you Christians had come to make war, but we see you are a good and reasonable people." The remainder of his speech was in Arabic, and was not interpreted. He also read the 10th Psalm from an Arabic Bible.

The last number on the programme was a Consecration Service, led by Dr. Bristol, of London. He said: "Our Lord Jesus Christ expects us to continue his pity, his sacrifice. Only that is consecration which has a Calvary tint and a Calvary heart. Others, who followed, said: "We never again can be what we have hitherto been." "The Bible will never be to us what it was, we shall read it with a new interest." "The green hill is no longer far away." "It is not for us to stand and gaze into the heavens, for God has said, 'Go ye into all the world.'"

From the Resolutions Committee came the following:

We reaffirm faith in the Bible made clearer by the knowledge we have gained on this trip. We rejoice in brotherly love. Our appreciation of missionary work is enlarged, and we believe it should be made more prominent in Sunday School work.

Whereas, the action of the International Sunday School Convention in regard to the teaching of temperance in our Sunday Schools has proved satisfactory and helpful, and whereas we hope for great advance in habits of sobriety and consequent morality from wise teaching on this vital theme.

Therefore, Resolved, that we earnestly exhort our Sunday School superintendents and teachers, not only to see that the temperance lessons are faithfully taught, but that every suitable opportunity is embraced of impressing upon our scholars the importance of temperance and sobriety from the many lessons upon these subjects found in the Word of God. (Applause.)

Resolved, that appreciating the blessings which have followed the ingathering of Sunday School workers from all parts of the world in the furtherance of international good will and fellowship, this Convention would urge all teachers of God's Word to impress upon those under their care, the duty of promoting peace among all nations, and the substitution of arbitration for the unchristian methods of war, and that a copy of this Resolution be forwarded to the Governments of the principal countries of the world. (Applause.)

Plans of teacher-training are approved and urged. The International Bible Reading Association is approved. Thanks to the Governor of Jerusalem for granting permission to place our tent.

Thanks to the Chief of Police for furnishing a guard.

Thanks to the Consuls for their many kind offices.

Thanks to the missionaries for valuable information.

Thanks to the Central Executive Committee for their wise plans for the Convention, and untiring zeal in carrying them out.

The whole company in the tent joined hands and sang, "Blest be the tie that binds," and "God be with you till we meet again," in which the Abyssinian general joined, also the ancient Mayor of Jerusalem and the Samaritan high priest. The blessing was pronounced by Dr. Monro Gibson.

What is to be the outcome of the World's Sunday School Convention lately held at Jerusalem? A statement concerning the people who attended may help in answering the question. Fifteen hundred and twenty-six persons signed their names on cards as delegates, but this does not represent the whole number, as there were 817 from the United States, 480 from England, New Zealand, Australia, etc.; 377 from Jerusalem, and 72 from other parts of Palestine, and still others from Turkey, Switzerland, Yucatan, etc.—from twenty-six countries in all. And they were of fifty-three different denominations, including Christians, Moslems, Samaritans, Jews, Armenians, Greeks, etc. It was truly a World's Convention.

Mr. E. K. Warren, the President, says: "In test moments every one heard in his own tongue, the Holy Spirit witnessing to all alike." This was evident from the deep feeling that at times swept over the whole congregation. They did not always understand each other, but they understood God. Mr. Warren also says, "'Love one another' and 'Love thy neighbor' have taken on a new meaning through this Convention, and that the result must be a closer unity between existing churches that will increase their power fourfold. Beginning in this world-wide manner at Jerusalem, may this spirit go to the uttermost parts of the earth."

On days before the Convention began, and during the days when the Convention was in progress, in the afternoon hours when no sessions were held, delegates industriously visited noted places in and about Jerusalem. Many took the Jericho, Dead Sea, and Jordan trips, going down in carriages, and along the way where the man fell among thieves, and stopping for a brief rest at the inn said to be erected on the spot where the good Samaritan brought the wounded man. Some bathed in the Dead Sea and then in the Jordan, and others sailed on the Jordan in small boats. The once glorious palm grove of Jericho has entirely disappeared, and even the sycamore tree which Zaccheus climbed. As to the inhabitants of Jericho, fleas are by far the most numerous.

Before visiting the Temple area, many of the delegates went to see the famous Shick models of the Temple of Solomon, the Temple of Zerubbabel, and the Temple of Herod, and the Mosques of Omar, and el Achva. They were then better prepared to understand the situation. An interesting event occurred at the temple area on Easter Sunday. A beautiful, snow-white carrier dove, which had been brought on board the Grosser Kurfuerst at New York, by Miss Jessie Ackerman, was set free, with this message tied under its wing, "Greetings to the Universal Peace Union from Jerusalem. Any one finding this message will communicate with Miss Jessie Ackerman." When liberated, the dove flew up and lighted on the Mosque of Omar, then it plumed its feathers, and flew toward the west. If it should make its way along the trackless waters and find the nest so dear from which it was taken, it will be a miracle, indeed.

Most of the delegates visited the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Russian pilgrims were there in large numbers, and their passionate kisses of the place where the Cross had rested, and where the body of Jesus had lain, as well as their deep groanings and cries, could but arouse sympathy. Most of the Russian pilgrims purchased cloths on which were printed the scenes of the crucifixion, which they laid upon the sepulchre of Christ, and then folded up to carry home, to be laid upon their own tombs. But the Garden Tomb, rather than the Holy Sepulchre, was the spot which stirred our deepest feelings. One by one we made our way to it, and lost ourselves in reverent thought. It is a simple rock-hewn tomb, with no embellishments save a simple garden in which little flowers bloom. Christians have purchased the site and walled it in. It is hoped thus to preserve it.

Again and again pilgrimages were made to the Garden of Gethsemane. It is rather a small enclosure with a low entrance, causing one to stoop. Within the outer wall is a high iron fence which encloses the old olive trees, one of them said to be sixteen hundred years old. Beautiful beds of flowers most carefully cultivated, are between the olive trees, and these are given to visitors by a monk in attendance. Open Bibles are in the hands of all who come to the Garden, which they read through tears, and often with sobbing. With closed eyes and prayerful hearts we deeply realize it all, and solemnly vow before God to deny ourselves and follow Him more closely than we have ever done before.

would almost be prepared to start for Lhasa at five minutes' notice, if the way were unexpectedly thrown open.' To their oldest, and the highest mission stations in the world—Poo and Leh—the Moravians have added six more points of evangelical light. Their missionary roll, past and present, embraces Pagell and Heyde, Jaeschke, the marvelous linguist and first translator of the Thibetan New Testament; Drs. Marx and Redslob, Ribbach and Sharde, soldiers of the Cross.

"Thibet is partially encircled by missionary bands, on its eastern, western, and southern borders. On the northern frontier of Thibet proper, neither man nor beast can live. Mr. O. T. Crosby, the American traveler, who has lately returned from Central Asia, describes it as consisting of hundreds of miles of tragic and desolate wastes, where even the camels of well-equipped caravans perish of cold and hardship. Upwards of eight missionary societies have stations on other than the northern frontiers of Thibet, embracing the Kashgarian Mission (Swedish) N.W., and the Church of Scotland Mission, S., associated with the Scottish Universities Mission. The latter, at Kalimpong, in Sikkim, is worthily linked with Dr. Hutchinson's labors. The London Missionary Society's strategic base at Almora is identified with the names of Miss Turner and Miss Rutledge, the latter declaring, "We mean to be amongst those who are to be first in Thibet." Two other ladies, Dr. Sheldon and Miss Brown, have made the northeastern part of Kumoan their special field.

"On the southern border, at Yatung, near the main route to the Chumbi Valley, Miss Annie R. Taylor, of Thibetan mission fame, persistently remains at her post, though, of late, she has had a hard time from the strong anti-foreign feeling existing among the wilder class of Thibetans. In the same region, the Assam Frontier Pioneer Mission, amid the fierce Abor tribes, tells of unusual difficulties and marvelous escapes.

"While the English Church Missionary Society has stations at Scrinagar, in the far west, and at Songpan, east; the famous Thibet Prayer Union, of the China Inland Mission, east and northeast, has its centre at Ta-chien-lu, ably superintended and led by Cecil Polhill. Mr. Polhill anticipates that very shortly great changes are in store for the long-secluded country of Thibet. He writes in glowing terms that Litang, the second town of altitude in the world, and containing one thousand families, twelve days west of Ta-chien-lu, and on the high road to Thibet, is now opened to the missionary.

"Of honored names interwoven with Thibet's Christianization, Susie Carson Rijnhart, M.D., takes a foremost place. This lady has returned to the land where she has previously suffered the loss of husband and child. Her missionary volume, With the Thibetans in Tent and Temple, a narrative of four years' residence on the Thibetan border, and of a journey into the far interior, recounts thrilling adventures such as few women have gone through and lived to tell the tale."

An Olive Branch

ALTHOUGH nothing may come of it, if the views of the diplomatists are to be believed, the action of our Government in tendering its good offices to Russia and Japan as peace-maker, is one that must afford satisfaction to peace-lovers generally. It may be that the opportune time for such an offer has not yet arrived, and that the belligerent spirit still runs too high to permit intervention to be thought of; but sooner or later, the true psychological moment will come—as it does in nearly all wars—when the olive branch extended by the peace-maker will be far from unwelcome.

But something more than an individual peace-maker is needed to settle the question at issue between Russia and Japan. Even if our offer of mediation should be ultimately accepted, and further fighting and useless waste of lives should be averted, the next, and indeed the wisest, step would be to send the whole matter to the Hague Arbitration Conference. The whole Eastern Question—that nightmare which has ridden Europe for a century, and which has been the cause of many bloody wars—is involved, and the only proper body capable of giving it the consideration it demands is either the Hague Tribunal itself, or a Special Commission to be appointed by that Tribunal.

While Japan has won much sympathy for its effort to "preserve the integrity of Asia," Russia is equally entitled to sympathy on other grounds. Her huge population of nearly 125,000,000—far exceeding that of any other European nation—seeks natural and legitimate avenues of expansion, which should not be denied. Her commerce, too, has been penned within narrow limits by the policy of those European Powers that have denied her access to the sea toward which she has long been struggling. Hemmed in on the Baltic and Black Seas, forced to the expedient of an outlet on the Siberian coast that is ice-bound more than half the year, Russia might have much to gain and nothing to lose by submitting her whole case to such a tribunal.

"Oh," says some ardent peace-lover, "if I were Czar, I would find some honorable way of quickly ending this dreadful war." But the Czar has comparatively little power in the administration of his great empire. Wolf von Schierbrand, writing from personal knowledge, says Nicholas is admirable as a man, but not as a ruler. Occasionally he is permitted to have his way. "With heart full of love for his people and all the world," he has been the victim of stronger men, who have brought the country to its present condition, and who overcame his conscientious scruples and forced the abandonment of the peace policy so hopefully inaugurated.

Japan, Russia, China, Korea were all among the signatories to the Hague Convention. Let us, as a nation, continue to use our influence in the interest of peace, and let us cherish the hope that, having held out the olive branch, it may soon be cordially accepted, and that the whole question now at issue in the Far East may be relegated to the domain of peaceful arbitration.

The Modern Quaker

THE Quakers of New York recently celebrated their 209th anniversary. Only eleven of the women who attended an afternoon "meeting for worship," at the Quaker meeting-house, were attired in the plain, old-fashioned Quaker dress, the others not being distinguishable by their costume from the most frivolous of the "world's people."

The line of demarcation between Friends and the "world's people" in speech and manner of dressing, has gradually grown fainter, until there is almost a blending of the two. Whether this is a matter to be really regretted or is merely a question of sentiment, is something which will admit of argument from both points of view. "We love our old-fashioned customs," said a prominent member of the Society of Friends, not long ago. "We love our plain meeting-houses, and the simple speech within them; the few plain bonnets, we have left—and the dear faces under them. We love our archaic 'thee' and 'thou,' and the democratic principles of human brotherhood which they represent; and we feel that if they disappear from among us we shall have parted with much that we cherish of our old-fashioned Quakerism. They are our links with the formative days of our Society—our present memories of the past, eloquently speaking to us of the trials of the early Friends, their struggles, devotion, and sacrifices."

Emerson said, "As a man begins to live more seriously within, he begins to live more simply without." This rule as applied to the modern Quaker, would seem to show that simplicity in dress is no longer of so much importance to right thinking and living; and while it may seem paradoxical, a Quaker may still be a Quaker even if dressed in the latest fashion, and though the old-time demureness of the Quaker maiden in her simple attire may have given way to the witchery of the twentieth century girl in a "picture" hat.

Concerning Backsliders

AMONG the letters that come to this office asking for counsel and guidance, there is no subject more common than that of backsliding. In many instances it is confessed with expressions of utter despair, the writers being overwhelmed with sorrow and shame, and having no hope of being forgiven and restored to God's love. In such cases the temptation is strong to go on in sin. There is a feeling that the joy of salvation being irretrievably lost, the lower joys of time and sense may as well be secured. It is surprising how ingenious the writers of these letters often are, in finding passages of Scripture, which, detached from their context, appear to confirm that idea. Doubtless, there are many people from whom we do not hear, who are under the same impression, which cannot too soon be removed.

Every Christian who has fallen into sin, and has become estranged from God, ought to realize that the wandering is his, and that the love of God still remains unchanged. As the love of a father or mother follows the wanderer into the far country, so God's love follows his wandering child, and no earthly parent rejoices more sincerely over the prodigal's return than does our Father in heaven. Backsliding ought to produce heartfelt sorrow, but never despair. He who sincerely repents, may be sure that if he returns he will receive cordial welcome and restoration. "The Lord your God is gracious and merciful, and will not turn away his face from you if you return unto him."

There is no limit to this mercy either in the number or degree of the transgressions. There is, however, a condition. No man is pardoned in his sins. He must not expect that God will accept him and his sin too. To come to God, asking forgiveness, and hoping that his love is so great that he will receive his child who is so weak that he must go on in sin, is to show ignorance of God's character. He is not weakly indulgent. The backslider must resolutely put away his sin when he comes for pardon. It is in that fact that the difficulty usually lies. The surrender must be made. God is fully aware of human weakness and is ready to impart the strength necessary for the conflict, but never to excuse the conflict.

Let no backslider despair; let none continue in sin under the impression that return is impossible. To all who will forsake their sin and ask in Christ's name for pardon and deliverance, the door is open and peace and safety are assured.

Brigands and Americans

IN the circumstances attending the abduction of Mr. Ion H. Perdicaris and his stepson, Mr. Cromwell Varley, by Moorish brigands, there is so much to recall the case of Miss Ellen Stone, who was kidnapped by the brigands of Macedonia, and held for ransom, that it need surprise no one to hear of the determination of our Government to make such a display of naval force as will compel the Moroccan authorities to release the captives. That Mr. Perdicaris is held for a ransom by the brigand chief, Raisuli, just as Miss Stone was kept captive by Sarafoff, President of the Macedonian Revolutionary Committee, is significant. For a long time past, Morocco has been distracted by internal wars, and only a few months ago the rebels were in the field force, defying the authority of the Sultan. A heavy ransom, such as would be demanded in the case of a wealthy man like Mr. Perdicaris, would be a substantial aid to any rebel movement now afoot. In the case of Miss Stone, the ransom was paid by contributions from the American public. Doubtless the Moorish outlaws have accepted this as a precedent, and have believed that any well-known or well-to-do American was a fair prize.

Of course Morocco will pay the ransom, and the young Sultan, in announcing the release of the captive will express his deep regret at the untoward incident. But if the affair is allowed to end there, it will be simply a triumph of brigandage. There are many American missionaries in Morocco, whom it is necessary to safeguard. What is needed, is such an example as will penalize brigandage, not only in Morocco but in other lands, and especially in Sicily, Turkey and Greece, where it still exists. Raisuli and his band should be captured, no matter at what cost to Morocco, and put behind bars for a term long enough to afford opportunity for repentance. Not only the payment of the ransom by Morocco, but the swift and rigorous punishment of the outlaws, is needed to make that country reasonably safe for Americans hereafter.

Counterfeit Christians

LOOKS don't count. Many a deception these days. Men and money alike are often counterfeit.

I handled a queer five-dollar bill the other day. It had done a heap of good—paid the widow's rent, bought food for the hungry, squared up three or four bad accounts that had been worse than cancers for worry, made a church treasurer happy when he found it on the plate, and made the sextor happier when his back salary was partly paid by it; but in due course of time it came to the bank whose name it bore and lo! the teller threw it out.

"What's wrong?" asked the depositor.

"Counterfeit."

All its good deeds did not make it pass the bank, where its real character was discovered.

I'm thinking of another day that is yet to come. It may be that some have done a heap of good; plenty of people passed them on for genuine Christians. They looked all right; sat in the pew like saints; scattered dollars like dew; but they have no God. He does not dwell in their heart. They have his name, but not him.

There are counterfeit Christians, just as there are counterfeit bills, and both are bad, in spite of looks.

He Values the "Crown Encyclopedia"

You have many testimonials from enthusiastic purchasers, engaged in literary and business pursuits, but none from us, men, who work for our living with our hands. May I add one? I have read my paper and magazine much more intelligently since having the handy volumes of my "Crown Encyclopedia" beside me.

A Large Demand

For the 900 slightly-damaged sets of the Crown Encyclopedia recently offered in these columns at one dollar, and 50 cents extra when expressage was to be prepaid, we have already received 2,805 orders, representing a demand more than three times as large as the supply. Rather than disappoint our friends who wished to purchase one of these damaged sets, we took new sets from stock and supplied the demand, again making good our claim that CHRISTIAN HERALD books are always better than advertised.

Millions in Barrels

NEVER in our national history have the vessels leaving New York for Europe carried so large an amount of treasure as those which sailed during the month of May. The payment for the rights and the plant of the Panama Canal amounted forty million dollars, besides the ten millions which our Government undertook to pay the new Republic of Panama for the concession. The French company stipulated for the payment of its forty millions in gold bars. It has tasked the resources of our Assay Office to meet the requirement. Its normal capacity is the production of three millions a week, but by using up the stock of gold bars on hand it was possible to ship twenty millions in a single week. The Lorraine of the French line carried ten millions, and the Kaiser Wilhelm II, the same amount. The illustration on this page shows the scene when the precious metal, packed in kegs, was being endorsed and carried away to the ships for shipment. Ten trucks were used to convey the kegs to the vessels. They were sent at different times, and on each truck there was an armed guard to protect it on its way through the streets of the city. A guard composed of the crews of the steamships, superintended the transport to the strong rooms of the vessels. Previous records of huge payments have not approached this enormous transaction. The largest was the purchase of Louisiana for fifteen million dollars. In 1868, seven and a half millions were sent to Russia in one payment for Alaska. In 1876, five and a half millions were paid to Great Britain, under the award of the Washington treaty, for infringement of fishery rights in Nova Scotia. These payments are completely eclipsed by the present transfers of ten millions at a time on individual ships. If material wealth were the true standard of value, we should conclude that no vessel ever carried so valuable a freight as these. As a matter of fact, however, the loss of one of these would not be so severe to humanity as would have been the loss of such a vessel as the Mayflower, or many another ship, on which missionaries were carrying the good news of salvation to heathen shores. Gold is not the best treasure for the world any more than it is for the individual.

A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth (Luke 12: 15).

The Length of a Dream

A remarkable test of the length of a dream was made recently by a physician, who is interested in psychical research, who related the facts in one of his lectures. He said that one day he went to visit a patient, and was eased to find him sleeping soundly. "I sat by his bed," said the doctor, and "felt his pulse without disturbing him. I waited for him to awaken. After a few minutes a dealer's cart, with discordant ringing bells, rumbled into the street, and as their first tones reached me, my patient opened his eyes. 'Doctor,' he said, 'I'm glad to see you, and awfully glad that you woke me, for I have been tortured by a most distressing dream that must have lasted for several hours. I dreamed that I was sick, as I am, and that my boy came into the room with a string of most horribly sounding bells and rang them in my ears, while I hadn't the power to move or speak to him. I suffered tortures for what appeared to be interminable time, and I'm so glad you woke me.' The ringing of those bells for one second had caused all of that dream, and just at the waking moment." Other instances of this kind have been cited, showing that when we lose consciousness, as in a trance, long periods may shrink to moments, and moments may protract themselves into hours and days. Time and space are clearly matters only of our present waking condition. New possibilities of both joy and misery are suggested by this fact, which shows how nearly our spiritual nature is allied to that of God himself.

One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day (II Peter 3: 8).

An Anarchist Deported

The case of the Anarchist, Turner, who was arrested in New York early this year, has been carried to the United States Supreme Court, on appeal from the decision of the Immigration Commissioners. They held that he must be excluded, under the law regulating the right of immigrants to enter the country. Mr. Turner's lawyer carried his case to the final court, on the contention first, as to the constitutionality of the law, and secondly as to the question whether his client's doctrines, without overt acts, brought him within the category of immigrants whose exclusion was authorized by the law. The decision of the Court was unanimous on both questions. Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering judgment, declared the law constitutional, and pointed out that though Mr. Turner had committed no offense against our laws, he had stated his beliefs, which prove him to have an ideal that was contrary to the principles of our government. That ideal was precisely the one, the berley, and has prospered. As he could not come here, he persuaded the girl to go to him, and she consented. On reaching Liverpool she will proceed to London, where she will take ship for South Africa. There her lover will meet her, and will conduct her to her future home. It is a long journey; but feeling sure that at the end of it her lover will be waiting to receive her, she will not worry about the trials of the way. It is so with the Christian's course through life. He is able to bear his troubles and vexations when he thinks of the welcome that he will receive when, having faithfully served his Lord, he enters into his presence.

Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord (Matt. 25: 21).

A Watch Won by a Sermon

A Cincinnati journal describes a sermon preached under remarkable circumstances in the outskirts of that city. A colored preacher was proceeding homeward after an evening service, when, in a dark street, he was suddenly stopped by three men, who held a revolver at his head. They warned him against making any outcry and bade him deliver any money or valuables he had. The preacher handed them his silver watch, the only article of any worth he had in his possession, besides a few dollars. Having done so, he asked them as a favor, as he was a preacher, to listen to a short sermon. They consented, on condition that it be brief. The preacher, then, in simple yet forcible terms, warned them of the consequences of theft, and showed them that their souls were imperilled by such crimes. At the close of his remarks, there was a consultation among the three robbers, the result of which was that they handed the preacher back his watch. From one point of view, the sermon may be regarded as a practical success, inasmuch as the preacher recovered his watch; but unless that was the beginning of repentance and restitution, the sermon failed of its purpose. Too many hearers of sermons content themselves with obeying a transient impulse, and neglect the permanent change in their lives that it is the design of the preacher to produce.

They hear thy words, but they will not do them; for with their mouth they show much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness (Ezek. 33: 31).

BRIEF NOTES

Great meetings are being held by Gen. Booth of the Salvation Army in Scandinavia. Those at Stockholm, Copenhagen, and Christiania were attended by vast crowds.

Miss Annie Taylor is now at Yatong, within the borders of Tibet, waiting anxiously for permission to penetrate farther into the interior.

Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, is delivering a course of lectures at the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, on the Old Testament Prophets and the New Testament Epistles, with an additional lecture entitled "Facts for use with Doubters." They are specially designed to help Sunday School teachers and lay workers.

An absolute cure of a case of leprosy is reported from the Louisiana Lepers' Home. The patient is a Creole boy born in New Orleans. His case, which developed four years ago, was a well defined case of leprosy. He has been two years under treatment, and is now perfectly cured. Five more patients believed to be well are being kept under watch for a brief period before being discharged.

The Northfield Young Women's Conference meets this year from July 12 to 19. Rev. G. Campbell Morgan will speak each morning at nine o'clock in the Auditorium, and sub-conferences, held in open tents on the beautiful campus of Northfield Seminary, will follow. All branches of Christian work, especially along missionary, Sunday School, and philanthropic lines, will be discussed by young women who are actively engaged in such work in various parts of the country.

The Orphanage at Phulera Rajputana, India, in which there are about one hundred children supported by readers of this journal, has been destroyed by fire. Provisionally no lives were lost, but the books, records and furniture were burned. The work of rebuilding has already been begun, and until it is completed the children and teachers will be sheltered in tents. Patrons of children in the orphanage will understand that the lists having been lost, they will get no reports from Miss Greene until she receives from this office the new lists, which have already been forwarded.

KEGS OF GOLD IN NEW YORK FOR THE CANAL PAYMENT

holding of which constituted him an Anarchist within the meaning of the law. He was, therefore, legally excluded from entering the country, or, having entered, remaining in it. Evidently the Supreme Court is of the same opinion as the inspired writer, that in estimating a man's character it is not enough to take account of his conduct. His thoughts, opinions, and beliefs must be considered.

As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he (Prov. 23: 7).

Crossing the Seas to Wed

The steamship Majestic, which sailed last week from New York for Liverpool, had an interesting passenger on board. It was a lady who was going to South Africa to be married. More than six years ago an attachment sprang up between her and a man who was employed in a store in New York. He was an Englishman, who had been only a short time on this side the Atlantic. When the Transvaal war broke out, he volunteered for service in the British army. He was too poor to marry, and the girl had family reasons for postponing her marriage. The obstacles on both sides have now been overcome, but the bridegroom-elect was unable to return to America to claim his fiancée. After the war, he obtained employment in a diamond mine near Kim-

A Marble Palace Among Green Hills

AWAY up amid the hills of Vermont, is a branch of the Y. M. C. A., which probably has the most palatial home of any such organization in the world, in proportion to the small population of Proctor, the town where it is located. It has a marble structure equal in cost and appointments to Y. M. C. A. buildings in some of the larger cities, although Proctor contains but 2,000 people.

The Vermont Marble Co., at Proctor, employ a large number of young men. Realizing the need of some resort for their amusement, the Company determined to make the Y. M. C. A. a present of a home. Members of the organization who are draughtsmen, prepared all the plans for the building, which was designed especially for the needs of an industrial community. When completed, it was presented to the Association by the Company, with appropriate exercises. Although the home and its equipment cost $30,000, the Company believes the Y. M. C. A. is such a benefit to the town that it has provided a fund of $2,000 yearly towards paying the expense of maintenance.

In other ways, the Proctor Y. M. C. A. is a notable Association. It probably represents more nationalities in proportion to its numbers than any other body of this kind. At present no less than sixteen different nationalities are enrolled:—Americans, Bohemians, Finns, English, French, German, Hungarians, Irish, Italians, Swedes, Hebrews, Norwegians, Poles, Scotch, Slavs, and Welsh. All of these classes are employed in the different branches of the marble industry. The foreign-born element is apparently as deeply interested in the welfare of the Association as are the American members, for of the 425 enrolled, a large proportion were born in other lands.

The Y. M. C. A. seeks not only to increase the religious interest in the community, and to furnish the young men amusement, but it is also an educational force. Classes have been organized in the common English branches, to instruct the foreigners especially, in the language of their adopted country. Some of the classes have a membership of sixty Swedes and Hungarians. Other branches taught are, mechanical drawing, penmanship, and architectural drawing. They are free to every member, as are all other facilities of the building.

This energetic Y. M. C. A., has a camera club which includes some experts in the photographic art, a baseball and football teams. As many members have no time for recreation during the day, it has provided tennis courts and a basket-ball ground where games can be played in the evening by electric light. Over a hundred members exercise in the gymnasium. Other forms of innocent amusement are added to the diversions. Marble bathtubs, elegantly appointed shower and needle-bath are features that are appreciated by its members.

Everyone in the town acknowledges that the Association has ready become a strong moral force. It is doing a fine work in making good American citizens. An illustration of this fact is found in the Italian contingent of members. Many of them are married and spend their leisure time at home, instead of at the club-house, but they are proud to be Y. M. C. A. members, and they pay their annual dues because they see it does such a good work, and they feel they ought to be on the roll of membership.

THE MARBLE Y.M.C.A. BUILDING AT PROCTOR

READY TO ATTACK PORT ARTHUR

A JAPANESE GUNNER

gard to Port Arthur; but the fateful moment is now very near, when the fiercest struggle of the war will begin, to which all that has preceded it, either by land or sea, will seem as child's play.

Gen. Kuroki's army, after the battle of Feng-Wang-Cheng, rested there in a condition of apparent inactivity for nearly two weeks. This, it now seems, was in obedience to orders, and for the purpose of permitting the landing operations at Takushan and other points to be completed, the new army being intended to secure the line of connection southward. Meanwhile, Gen. Oku's force is being greatly strengthened on the lower peninsula, in preparation for the advance on Port Arthur. On May 26, Kin-Chow, thirty-two miles north of Port Arthur, was stormed and captured by the Japanese, who occupied the castle and afterwards drove the Russians from the heights, to which they had retired. The losses on both sides are said to have been heavy. The fall of Kin-Chow was naturally a great surprise to the Russians, who had believed it would resist reduction successfully.

As military experts predicted, the Cossacks now appear to be warming up to their peculiar work, both in Manchuria and Korea, and are proving a sharp thorn in the side of the Japanese. They are ubiquitous, at one time in front, and the next pounding away at the rear of the enemy. Enterprising bands of these "rough riders" have annoyed Gen. Kuroki greatly, and compelled him to reinforce the First Army Corps with reserve battalions from Japan. This, together with the heavy weather, the difficulty in moving big guns, and the danger of getting too far from the base of supplies, has contributed to retard the forward movement of the Japanese.

Among the incidents of the week were an attempt by a force of Cossacks to cut off Kuroki's communications northeast of Kwan-tien, which the Japanese repulsed, and a brush northwest of Takushan, where a squadron of Russian cavalry were driven off with considerable loss. St. Petersburg had a report of a fight on the Liao-Yang road, near Feng-Wang-Cheng, in which 15,000 Japanese were killed and wounded, the Russians losing 3,000, but there was no confirmation of the report. On the other hand, the Shan-hai-Kwan correspondent of the London Chronicle, telegraphs that a Japanese force, feinting retreat, drew 15,000 Russians into an ambush in the Ta-tung Pass, where 30,000 Japanese were posted. The Russians lost 4,000 in killed and wounded, and over 1,000 prisoners.

The following, from the Russian General Staff at St. Petersburg, gives an idea of the general situation:

The prevailing opinion at the headquarters of the General Staff is that the withdrawal of the Japanese upon Feng-

Wang-Cheng means that the enemy has decided to devote himself primarily to operations against Port Arthur, and that the present object of Gen. Kuroki, with the First Army, supported by Gen. Nayda, with the Third Army (now landing near Takushan), is to watch Gen. Kouropatkin and prevent a move southward, which would take Gen. Oku and the Second Army (on the Liao-Tung Peninsula) in the rear. A direct attack upon Gen. Kouropatkin's main force is apparently not considered to be impending. Nothing more than outpost affairs are anticipated. Russian scouts are keeping in constant touch with the enemy, and thus far the minor shiftings of the Japanese detachments west of the Tayang River and northward of Moi-Ting-Lang are in the nature of screens.

A startling charge has been made by Japan, in connection with the sinking of the battleship Hatsuse. It is said that the Russians at Port Arthur have set adrift mines, outside of the harbor, which are now floating across Pech-i-li Strait, and far out to sea, endangering the ships of neutral Powers. Twenty-one of these mines were found by despatch boats, far off-shore. Japan will make formal protest to the Powers on the subject. Russia, on the other hand, denies placing loose mines, and charges that the mines in question were scattered by Japan, to the peril of all.

A RUSSIAN ARTILLERYMAN

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Man of the House

HE came down the road, walking with a slow, halting step, as if an invisible weight were bound on his feet. His wife, looking from the window, was struck by his pallor. In a fleeting glimpse she saw, her eyes suddenly illuminated, that William was growing old. That haggard face, those stooping shoulders, that look of discouragement, were wholly unlike her blithe, cheery husband.

William Forbes did not, as usual, enter his house by the front door. He went round to the back, and stood at the end of the lane, looking down and waiting for the hired man, Silas Beam, who was driving home the cows. The delay gave Mrs. Forbes her opportunity.

"Molly," she said, "not one word to your father to-night about your new suit."

"But, mother," remonstrated twenty-year-old Molly, who had set her mind on a lovely India silk with a blouse trimmed with lace and embroidery, and a jacket with blue sides, "how can I go to Aunt Phebe's unless I get some new clothes? How can I, mother?"

"I don't know, dear. I only know you must not bother papa this evening. I can't. Not a single hint, Molly. And you, Jack, don't ask your father for a suit."

"All right, mother," answered Jack, putting his Latin reader on the shelf and taking down his algebra.

Mr. Forbes came in. As his wife met him cheerfully, taking his hat from his hand, and drawing forward an easy chair, he smiled, but wanly. In twenty-five years of marriage, he had not failed to answer the challenge of her smile with his own responsive brightness. But lately, dearly as they loved one another, it was complete as was their mutual comprehension, Ellen Forbes was aware that William was keeping something back from her; that he was not wholly at ease, that there was a distress of some sort tugging at his tranquility. She tried to find out what it might be. When dinner was over, the good plain dinner that was so appetizing and wholesome for a tired man, who daily carried old luncheon from home to the store, Molly and Jack went to the Christian Endeavor meeting, and their parents were left alone.

"Will," said Ellen suddenly, "what troubles you? Is anything wrong?" "Nothing, except that when this month ends, I shall lose my job." She caught her breath in surprise and dismay.

"Why, Will," she exclaimed, "you've been with Rice & Kildare since you were a lad."

"Yes, that is true."

"Of what do they complain? What have you done amiss?" The wife's tone was indignant. Her eyes snapped. She knew that her husband had served his employers faithfully, that he had not neglected any labor nor scamped any service.

"It is of what I cannot do that they complain, Nellie. Since my man Rice died, and Mr. Kildare senior retired, the younger men have come into power, with new methods. I am too slow for them. They want me to go on the road as I always have, two or three times a year, but they insist that I must travel on Sunday, and I have declined."

"Certainly you could not go back on your record, to violate the Fourth Commandment under foot and travel on the Lord's day. You did perfectly right to stand up for your life-long convictions, and I'm proud of you. Never mind about securing another place. There's work enough right here on this bit of a garden and farm."

"I'm no farmer, Ellen."

"I am. I was raised on a farm. We'll let Silas go. He can find work without any trouble. We've a little saved, a little more, Will, than you know about, for I've always been saving something for a rainy day. We'll all pull together, and I believe you'll find there's money in garden and chickens and eggs. We're near enough a fine market. Why, William Forbes, the whole thing rises before my eyes, a vision of prosperity. I am thankful those young men don't want you, and thankful for the reason. There could be no blessing if you went against principle."

The young people came gaily in from their meeting to find their father and mother chatting as eagerly as if they were children planning for a picnic.

"You two are real lovers, aren't you?" said Molly, as she kissed them good-night.

"Lovers! why, yes," said her mother. "That's what makes our home so worth while. We are very happy, Molly, and we are going to be happier."

Molly did not get her dainty suit that season, but she looked like an opening rose in her old one nicely made over, and so thought young Louis Parke, who had long covertly admired her, but had feared to take on himself the responsibility of marrying a girl brought up in the great comfort and luxury which Mrs. Forbes, by good management, had always provided for her home. A chance remark of his sister's, that Molly Forbes had more economy about her than most girls, and knew how to wear a dress longer than any of her friends, decided Lewis, that a poor young man might venture to seek her for his life partner. And as Molly had liked him from school-days, love was an easy step forward.

William Forbes tried a twelvemonth of amateur farming; but he was not a shining success in this. If his wife had not developed a remarkable talent for buying and selling, as well as raising produce, they would have lost all they invested.

THE MINSTREL PILGRIMS OF JAPAN

Bound by a vow, these pilgrims pass
Along the highways of Japan,
Fluting sweet airs, and asking alms,
And meeting hardship as they can.
We, in our Christian life, may take
A lesson from their fortitude,
And sing along our pilgrim way,
For all our days, our God is good.

Here she proved herself an example of what a woman can do when she is allowed to enter an open door of opportunity. Yet the experiment was not all loss, for the out-door life and exercise made a new man physically of Mr. Forbes, who had been shut in most of his mature years, except for outings, which involved absence from home, long railway rides, nights in Pullmans, and homesick tarrying in hotels.

One day Mr. Forbes received a letter. It was from a business house in town, and offered him a position superior to his former one, both in emolument and honor. At the end of the letter there was this sentence, "We want a Christian man, one who respects and keeps the Sabbath, as we do ourselves."

"I told you, William, the hand of Providence was in it, when you lost your old job, did I not?"

"Yes," he answered, "dearest wife, you did."

Two of My Friends

AMONG my friends are Sadie and Evelyn, who work at curling feathers in a shop downtown in New York.

It does not seem to girls who have whole months to spend in holidays that one or two weeks can hold much outdoor pleasure? A working-girl knows better. She knows that into her few days of absolute liberty, more genuine enjoyment can be compressed than some rich girls derive from their abundant opportunities for travel and recreation. I think I will tell you what Sadie and Evelyn and I said to one another the other evening.

Sadie said, "The best thing about a vacation is that one may lie in bed an hour later in the morning. One needn't hurry to get her breakfast and then run to the shop; and one can fold her hands all day long."

Evelyn drew a long breath. "My vacation," she confided, "means more to me than that. It means fun. I love to be where I can take time to laugh. It means bathing in the surf, and taking long walks, and sitting down to a nice table three times a day, and eating, oh, with such an appetite! Sadie and I are going to the Beach this year! It's near enough home not to cost too much for traveling expenses, and the board where we are going is very reasonable. Our room is engaged. But we both need new dresses and hats."

"Girls," I ventured to say, taking the privilege of intimacy, "why must you spend money on new clothes for your holiday? You both have pretty things now. I've seen you on Sunday afternoons, with your dainty suits and shirt waists. Let me tell you what a girl's 'must haves' are on a holiday. They are a better suit for Sunday, if you have it; and for every day several changes of underwear, a sailor hat, comfortable, broad-soled shoes, plenty of stockings, a short skirt, and a jacket for cool mornings and evenings. You don't want to miss a single bit of pleasure, a row in a boat, a sail, a drive, a walk, or any other excursion. A number of girls combining can afford trips that would be impossible for one."

Sadie blushed and laughed. "Last summer," she said, "I met a young man on his holiday, as I was, and do you suppose he would have looked at me twice if I had been dressed like a dowdy?"

"Girls are often, by the way of meeting a young man," I said. "There is always the possibility of meeting one whom you may like very much. But let me tell you the young man sees very little indeed except your bright smile, and your pleasant face, and cordial greeting. Men are not so impressed as women fancy, by millinery and gewgaws. You don't mean to tell me, Sadie," I added, doubtfully, "that you make haphazard acquaintances on trains or boats?"

"No, indeed, we don't do that," she answered. "We have no need, and our mothers would not let us."

This was true. No girls in the world are better watched and guarded than are working-girls by good mothers.

"But," said Evelyn, "the house we go to is not a nunnery. It is a home, and the lady who presides over it likes us to have our friends in for a dance, or a little music, or games, in the evenings. Our holidays are much pleasanter if there are some nice men about, as well as a lot of nice girls."

To be sure, I agree with Evelyn. Only I don't want my girls to let themselves become too deeply interested in men who may be only passing acquaintances. The man who hopes to have his summer friend an all-the-year-round friend, will ask her if he may call at her home and see her father and mother there.

Other girls, with a little more time than the two I have mentioned, may go to summer schools and conferences, and combine study with recreation. I know girls who have utilized their summer holiday by studying some branch of art, as designing, or painting on china, or who have taken a course in elocution, or in singing. A girl who cannot afford a holiday unless she works, and thus gains a change of scene, may do as Nettie did—the bright-faced, smiling Nettie—who brought my jug of hot water to my door on the mornings of a certain July some years ago. She was a farmer's daughter, attending a normal school, and she could not get any money unless she acted during a month or two as chambermaid in the summer hotel. Nettie has been teaching mathematics this year in a high school.

The Shining Side of the Cross

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

LET us call the witnesses to the resurrection of Jesus: 1. The angel: "I descended from heaven to roll away the stone from the door of the tomb of Jesus, for on the third day it was appointed that he should rise again. I rolled the stone away, and sat upon it, and he came forth like a rising sun."

2. The guard: "The sound of the earthquake and the appearance of the angel so alarmed us, that we were as dead men. When we recovered ourselves, we went to the chief priests and told them that Jesus had risen from the dead. They offered us large money if we would report instead that somebody had come and stolen him away. On their promise to protect us from the Governor, we took the money and so reported."

3. Jesus Christ: "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore."

4. Salome: "With Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James, I went very early, on the first day of the week, to the tomb of Jesus, bearing spices that we might anoint his dead body. We remembered the large and heavy stone at the door of his tomb, and we wondered whom we should get to roll it away. As we approached, we saw that the stone was already rolled away, and an angel sat upon it, who said, as he saw our startled look, 'Fear not ye, for I know that ye seek Jesus, who hath been crucified. He is not here; for he is risen, even as he said.' And then he took us into the tomb, and showed us the place where Jesus had lain."

5. Apostles Peter and John: "Mary Magdalene brought word that the tomb of Jesus was empty. We ran as fast as we could to the tomb to see for ourselves, and found it even so. John was the first at the tomb, and saw the linen cloths lying there, with which the corpse of Jesus had been wrapped."

6. Mary Magdalene: "I came back a second time to the tomb, and looking in through my tears, I was seen by two angels, who said, 'Woman, why weepest thou?' I answered, 'Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' Then I heard another voice beside me, saying, 'Woman, whom seekest thou?' I supposed it was the gardener, and said, 'Tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away,' for I could not believe what the angel had said was true. Just then I heard my name spoken in familiar tones, 'Mary.' I turned about, and saw that it was Jesus himself. I would have touched him to make sure that he was alive, but he forbade me. I saw him but for a moment, and he was gone. Then I ran and told the apostles that I had actually seen the Lord, and the words he had spoken. But they would not believe me."

7. Mary, the mother of James: "With Salome, I went to tell the disciples that the angel said to us on our first visit to the tomb that Jesus had risen from the dead. On our way, Jesus himself met us, and greeted us with 'All hail.' He told us to tell his disciples that he would meet them in Galilee. From them we learned that Mary Magdalene also had seen Jesus at the tomb in the garden."

8. Cleopas: "With another disciple, I was on my way from Jerusalem to Emmaus, talking about the crucifixion of Jesus and the strange report brought by the women that he had risen from the dead. We were presently joined by another traveler. He entered wonderfully into our conversation, and showed us out of the Scriptures how all things we were talking about had been foretold by the prophets. It was late when we reached Emmaus, and so we invited the stranger to take supper with us. As he broke bread and gave thanks, we recognized that it was Jesus himself! And then he left us, vanishing out of our sight. We returned to Jerusalem, to testify of his resurrection."

Illustration and Application

Our lesson story suggests three topics: 1. The resurrection of Christ. 2. Our own resurrection from physical death. 3. Present resurrections in character.

What is the nearest monument and proof of the resurrection of Christ? Remember that monuments are not all of stone. Anything that is intended to keep the resurrection in memory is a monument. Monuments and proofs of Washington's life and influence include not alone monuments in bronze and stone, but states, cities, streets and squares that bear the name of Washington, and, most honorable of all, the letter stamp that keeps his noble face before us every day. As we can go inside the Washington Monument at the National Capital, so we are now inside the nearest monument and proof of Christ's resurrection. What is it? The "Lord's Day," of course, so called every week from New Testament times (Rev. 1:10), because on this "first day of the week," our "little Easter," the "Lord" arose. The Lord's Day is not a single monument, but a long series of monuments, which, like milestones, lead us back to the very door of the empty tomb in Joseph's garden. It is not "rationalism" but against reason, to suppose that an event never occurred, which the most intelligent nations of the world have all these centuries generally celebrated, by suspending on one day in every way the two pursuits in which men naturally take deepest interest—the pursuit of gain and the pursuit of pleasure. As well say all the monuments of Washington have grown out of a myth.

And what other monuments of the resurrection are near at hand? Yes, the annual Easter, of which Keble writes:

Thou art the sun of other days,—
They shine by giving back thy rays.
Sundays by thee more glorious break,
An Easter day in every week.

There is yet another monument of Christ that we are now in. What is it? "The year of our Lord." That indeed is reckoned from the birth of Christ, but the most intelligent nations would not date all events from his birth if he had not proved himself more than man by his resurrection. The world's real birth dates from Christ's resurrection.

And there is yet another present monument and proof of the resurrection that we are in: What is it? "Christendom," whom they had been in daily intercourse for more than forty years. 3. That Peter, who trembled at the careless question of a girl, faced the Sanhedrin and prison with boldness a few days later, with no cause for the transformation. 4. That the conscious impostor uttered the most noble and lofty ethical teaching the world has ever known. 5. That the cross, the emblem of ignominy, like the gallows to-day, became an ornament and an object of adoration, without any adequate reason for the change. 6. That an organization beginning with twelve men without wealth, or political, or military power, in less than 300 years conquered the Roman empire without aid. 7. That hundreds of strong men and delicate women went calmly to a painful death for a belief in a crucified malefactor. 8. In a word, he must account for the marvel of history, the growth of the Christian Church, and for nineteen Christian centuries.

S. A. WILSON.

Let us not delay longer upon the abundant proofs of Christ's resurrection, but turn to its practical lessons, remembering especially that Christ is not a deity of the past age and a far-away land, but a living, present Saviour and King.

He died!

And with Him perished all that men hold dear;
Hope lay beside Him in the sepulchre;
Love grew stone-cold; and all things true beside Died when He died.

He rose!

And with Him Hope arose, and Love, and Light
Men said, 'Twas Death, not Christ, died yesternight
And Truth and Trust, and all things virtuous, Rose when He rose.

ROBERT R. DOHERTY.

Our own resurrection is proclaimed and assured in that of Christ, who had taken on humanity, thus to show its glorious possibilities. We, too, in a glorified body, are to live again after death. The question we are still asking about the dead, "In what body do they come?" is best answered by Paul in I Cor. 15th, a chapter referring only to the resurrection of the saints (v. 23). He sends us to nature to learn that we sow not the body that shall be, but as the seed decays and out of it grows a new body of multiple powers, so in a Christian's death there is "sown a natural body," there is "raised a spiritual body" (vv. 43, 44). Let us not seek to penetrate the mystery farther. Enough that as in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Matt. 8:11), and of Moses and Elijah (Matt. 17:3), our human personality is to continue through the centuries, and also our fellowship with Christ, and with the good angels true. Christ glorified our human nature at his birth, but yet more in his resurrection and ascension. "You are dying," said a friend to a Christian woman with her, "shall I not serve for a clergyman to come and pray with you?" "Oh, no; never mind," she said, "I am ready to die at any moment." "But are you not afraid to die?" "No," she said very cheerfully, "I am not afraid, for I belong to death. Master. I am a sinner saved by grace, child of the resurrection." A young child stood at the window, where he could see the funeral procession of his playmate go by. He looked at it with fixed attention for awhile. Then he turned to his mother, his face alighted up with gladness, as he said, "Oh, mamma, how beautiful it will be when Jesus says, 'Baby, come forth.'"

G. SPANGENBERG

"THE ANGEL SAID UNTO THE WOMEN, FEAR NOT YE"

which means Christ's Kingdom, and includes Christianized Europe and its expansion on this continent. The resurrection of Lazarus is not so wonderful as the humane resurrection of Europe, which at the time of Christ's death was wholly given to idolatry, and had not yet discovered the seven Pleiades of Christian humanitarianism, justice, purity, liberty, equality, charity, humanity, fraternity, that is, did not know these words in the sense that even those who are not Christians use them in the same lands to-day.

About the year 1845, LeVerrier, a French astronomer, calculated that if another planet could be found moving in a certain orbit, it would account for the disturbances of the planet Uranus. He sent the results of his investigations to an observatory in the city of Berlin, requesting that search be made on a fixed date at a certain spot in the heavens. There and then the planet Neptune was discovered, not fifty minutes from its estimated location by the astronomer LeVerrier. Similarly, from a historical view-point, the resurrection of Jesus is an intellectual necessity. There have been such historical disturbances, that, short of such a fact, there is no accounting for them.

Another monument of Christ's resurrection is Christianity, as embodied in the many-branched Christian Church. Look at this world-conquering Church, and contrast it with the little handful of disheartened disciples, who on that first Easter, awoke with no purpose beyond embalming their crucified Master. Something must have happened since then.

What one Must Believe if he does not Believe in the Resurrection of Christ

1. That Jesus lies buried in a sepulchre in Judea. 2. That eleven men were deceived as to the identity of one with Spring and Summer have in all ages whispered to man a hope of the resurrection. "Easter" was originally the name of a pagan spring festival of that significance. And Jew's sermon says that the Hebrew Passover, another spring festival, was "doubtless as much a celebration of nature's delivery from the blighting grasp of winter's dominion, as of Israel's delivery from Pharaoh's yoke." Into that Passover festival Jesus introduced the cross and the resurrection, by which spring's whisper of a future life was raised into a paean of assurance.

The most important resurrection is the present resurrection of character, without which there is no help for us in the resurrection of Christ, who said, "All that are in the tomb shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done ill unto the resurrection of judgment (John 5:29). We are often summoned to the present resurrection of character in such words as, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above" (I Cor. 3:1, 2; Rom. 6:4, 14:7-9). A New York artist and author took a building used for a stable and factory, and made it over into a most artistic home. It was an architectural resurrection, recalling the poem

Build thee more stately temples, O my soul
As the swift seasons roll;
Leave thy low-vaulted past.

Luther used to say, "When one comes and knocks at the door of my heart and asks 'Who lives here?' I reply, 'Martin Luther used to, but he has moved out, and Jesus Christ now lives here.'" The risen Christ comes anew to, and into those whose self has been crucified to be in them a new life of glad service.

O joy, to Mary first allowed, when roused from weeping o'er his shroud,
So is it still—to holy tears in lonely hours Christ Risen appears;
In social hours who Christ would see, must turn all tasks to charity

FOR CONSCIENCE SAKE

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

AND so the old house is to be opened at last," said Uncle Dan'l, as he leaned on his spade and looked across the road to the house opposite. The building was of brick, and stood back from the street, tall elms shading its front from the too ardent rays of the summer sun. Uncle Dan'l resumed his work of spading up the garden beds in the front yard of his own cottage, meanwhile continuing his musings.

"Seems as if it was but yesterday, when it was built," he murmured, "and it was sixty-six year ago this spring, sence them wooden shetters was nailed up, and they've never been took down, and now they're a-goin' to open it up and sell it," and the old man began to carefully loosen the soil around a large rose-bush, growing between the sitting-room windows. Very carefully he worked with tender touch. "Best a-comin' into bloom agin', aint ye?" he said; "to be sure it is not the same as that I planted here so many years ago, but I've been mighty careful about it, and a-trainin' the slips as like I could to the old bush."

"And they air really a-goin' to open the house, now that David is gone."

"He's been gone from us a good many year, and I've never ceased to wonder if Nancy did jest edactly right to let him go. She did, he would hev made her a good husband, for he set sech store by her; but she had her own notions of right and wrong, and so hed he fur that matter, and she stuck to 'em through thick en thin, an' she would he."

"It was jest a question of which was right, and I've never quite settled it in my mind. I can remember that June as well as if 'twas yesterday, and how proud the happy Nancy was a-singin' about her work, a-puttin' the finishin' touches to her wedding dress, while David put the finishin' touches to the house. He built it right across the road, so as not to take Nancy away from her father an' mother. I guess they knew there was not much danger, after Louisa Eldredge showed her good sense a-marryin' Zeb Carter instead of me." And the old man straightened up, and looked long and earnestly across the street at the shuttered house. Grim and silent it stood; but there was nothing of the tumble-down order about it, for it was built of substantial brick, which had withered nearly half a century of storms, and it looked as if it might last another fifty years.

The windows were concealed by tightly nailed wooden shutters, and the doorways had also been boarded up. Grass grew rank and thick all around, and in the corner of the yard stood an immense clump of lilac bushes, which had grown to the proportion of small trees. Great fragrant masses of purple flowers nodded and swayed in the June breezes every year, and they seemed to say that no matter what might come, they would be faithful to their trust; for had not David whispered, as he set out the slender bush, so many years ago, "Lilacs, bloom as soon as you can, for Nancy loves ye so. Next to white roses, Nancy loves ye." But David had gone never to return, long before the lilacs bloomed. Still they blossomed year after year, and every season more than twenty years a sweet-faced woman would come from the cottage across the street, and gather the blossoms, burying her face in their fragrance, which carried her back to that happy time so long ago; but she never entered the house, in fact no mortal foot had trod within its portals, since a man with set teeth turned the key in the lock, and gave orders that doors and windows should be closed, and never opened until he so ordered.

Uncle Dan'l works in his beloved garden, and the breeze sighing through the elms reaches the lilacs, and we will go back to that time when David Stearnes built and furnished the house, and when the day set for his wedding with sweet Nancy Hills was very near. How busy they both had been for many months; how everything about the house had been planned with joy in the present, and a belief in an almost glorified happiness to come, when they should begin life in the beautiful home opposite the cottage, where Nancy and her brother Dan'l had been born. The mother renewed her youth in seeing that her daughter was well supplied with all that went to make glad the heart of a New England housewife of that day. Piles of bed and table linen grew under their busy fingers, and at last all was finished, and everything was in the most complete and perfect order in the new house.

The building was far more pretentious, the grounds larger, and the furnishings of the house more complete and elaborate than Nancy or her parents had looked for; for David was a carpenter, and worked at the bench, and while the young man assured them that he had not run in debt for anything, and that everything was certainly paid for, still there was a feeling of uneasiness upon the part of the old folks, which in time was shared by Nancy.

Finally, David said that he would tell her all about his good fortune, which had enabled him to build so fine a house and furnish it so beautifully.

"I can see them now," said Uncle Dan'l, as he carefully separated the roots of "Johnny-jump-ups" preparatory to making several clusters of this tiny forbear of our gorgeous, velvet pansies, "I can see them now as they went across the road, jest as the sun was a-settin' on that June day, so long ago. David was a likely lad, jest like a brother, always, and Nancy, well, she was always as sweet as one of them white roses she loved so; but I guess David found the briars that night, fur we never seen him agin'. When I come to know about things, I couldn't blame him, and as it was a clear case of doing a thing honestly fur conscience sake, I couldn't blame her."

"And now he is dead and the house will be opened, and everything sold for the benefit of them distant cousins of David's away off in York State."

"How white Nancy looked when she came home in the dusk that night. I never seen David again, and Nancy never told me what passed between 'em, only that David had not come by the money honestly, accordin' to her ideas, and as he would not come to her way of thinkin', she had told him she would not marry him. And only that morning she had been so anxious that the white rose-bush should be in bloom, so that she could wear some of the buds in her hair and on her breast at her wedding, and her wedding-dress was all done, too, and everything else was ready."

"I never seen a woman who looked so sweet and gentle as Nancy, so set in her way. I tried to talk to her once, and then I give it up. I guess she and mother had some kind of an understandin', for they seemed to be a dretful comfort to each other. Mother came of one of the old Puritan families, an' I guess that accounted for some of Nancy's firmness."

Here Uncle Dan'l raised his wide-brimmed straw hat and mopped his bald head with his handkerchief. Then taking the clipping-shears, he began trimming the narrow strip of box which bordered the garden beds. "If folks ever hears me a-talkin' as they go by, I 'spose they don't know what to think, but ever sence father and mother died an' I've been alone, it seems so natural to talk to these plants, especially about Nancy, for she an' me used to work over 'em so much."

"She never went over to the sheltered house only in June, when the lilacs was in bloom, and then every evenin' as long as they lasted she would go over jest as the sun was settin' and bring home some of the blossoms; and how she did tend that white rose-bush. Them two things is all that let me know she hadn't forgot David, for she never spoke of him, and we never heard from him, only that he was a-wanderin' around furrin' parts, and that he kept the taxes paid on the house, and that it was never to be opened as long as he lived. And now David is dead, and they are a-goin' to open it. I am glad Nancy

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME REMEMBERED

Friends Across the Continent Endow Cots in Memory of Their Own Dear Dead

A GOOD many years ago, there lived in a New England University town a young girl, who wandered at will during the summer months among the hills and meadows where bloomed the shy wild flowers and the ferns. The freedom of sunshine and country air were hers by right of birth; and when she married and went to live in the city, though wealth and all the luxury that money could bring came to her, the girl-wife's heart always turned to the country. When the boys came—three of them—to bless her life, they were given all the blessings that come with wholesome country living.

Years passed on, and found the girl no longer young—widowed, and living far away from the scenes of her youth. Not so far however but that the story of Mont-Lawn and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home reached her. Two of the boys, who had made life so full of joy to her, had passed to the other life, and in memory of these dear ones, two cots have been endowed for the season by this loving mother, who says in a recent letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

My heart goes out to little ones, for I have been much with them, through ten years of teaching in orphan asylums. I send the money for two cots ($42.00) in memory of my two dear ones, who have passed on to begin life anew. I want to do something for some of God's poor little ones, who have so few of the joys of life that were once all mine; but, alas! I was not wise enough to share them as I should have done, and now I am a widow, a school-teacher, with one "live lamb" left of the dear flock. It makes me happy to send my mite, and may it let a little of God's sunshine and sweet country air into some dear child's life, for I feel that one who has not met kind Mother Nature in her country home, has not truly lived.

May you all be greatly blessed in your work, is the earnest wish of yours truly, Sacramento, Calif. MARY E. T.

The pictures of the children in whose memory Mrs. T., sends her offering, will hang over the cots, and the little occupants will thus be reminded of the kind mother who, though her own babies are no longer with her, has made it possible that fourteen poor children may have a delightful vacation at Mont-Lawn this summer.

The ladies of East Milford, N. H., being very much interested in the Children's Home, held a fair and gave a series of entertainments for the benefit of this beautiful charity, raising $68.17, which generous gift THE CHRISTIAN HERALD acknowledges with many thanks. The committee under whose auspices the money was raised consisted of Miss Francis M. Murphy, Miss Annie Anderson, Miss Charlotte Holt, Anthony Rossi, and Miss Louise Young. At one of the entertainments, a song entitled "The Fresh-Air Fund," composed for the occasion by Mrs. T. H. Carleton, of Milford, N. H., was sung by the children, beginning:

How beautiful and strange
This world of hopes and fears,
'Tis first a ray of sunshine
And then a flood of tears.

Not long ago, a lady who has been connected for many years with mission work in one of the poorest localities of New York, spoke of the pathetic conditions in some families in her district, where the children were so poorly clad that it was impossible to give them a vacation. Some little ones are absolutely without clothing of any kind, except one ragged, dirty garment that scarcely serves to hide its nakedness; "and it would make your heart ache," said the good woman, "if you could see as I do, the efforts the poor mothers make to get their little ones in some kind of presentable shape, to send away. I know they take their own poor, worn-out dresses, and with fingers so stiff from washing and scrubbing that they can scarcely hold a needle, they will fashion in a clumsy way, a shapeless covering for the little girl or boy; and that the child may have a pair of cheap, coarse shoes, the mother will go barefoot, or will wear a pair of old shoes, ragged and broken, which she may have fished out of some ash-barrel, where they had been thrown by a more fortunate neighbor, whose husband was working and kind enough to bring home part of his pay.

"The older children, these 'little mothers' who have once tasted the happiness of life among the birds and flowers, how they regale the younger ones with wonderful tales of what Mont-Lawn is like, and what good things there are to eat, and 'real beds' to sleep in, where you take your clothes off, every one, before you go to bed, and how 'teacher' tells the nicest stories, while she helps undress the children; and it is all so wonderful, that the small auditors are not always inclined to believe all the story, and think the big brother or sister is telling a fairy tale.

"Where a family lives in one stifling, unventilated room, the children often sleep on the floor, just where they happen to drop."

Partly worn little dresses and underwear, jackets and trousers, are very acceptable in fitting out the children, and all such may be sent direct to the Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y.

ain't here. I know she loved every brick in that house, every blade of grass in the yard, and every leaf and flower on the trees and lilac bushes. I know she loved David, for when she died, mother put her wedding-dress on her, and put white roses in her hair and purple lilacs on her breast. "Nancy wanted it," was all she said, and though she may not have known anything about it, every June her old brother has put the same flowers from the same bushes on her grave. I know David's love was true, although he could not think as Nancy did, or he would not have wandered all over the world and never had a home, until he died—he was set in his way too. I guess we air all a little inclined that way, and ef we can't hev things jest as we want 'em, we won't hev 'em at all.

"It was for Nancy's sake that David went away, but it was for conscience sake that Nancy gave him up, all because David drew a winning ticket in a lottery and built and furnished the house with the money.

"I have never been able to figure it out entirely to my satisfaction. Still, if David had stole the money, or got it in some mean underhanded way; ef he had cheated in his dealin's with his feller-critters, and took advantage in anyway; ef the money had been accumulated a sellin' rum, or ef David had gambled, I could make up my mind mighty quick as to who was right in the matter; but a lottery, that seems to be open to argument. They's a number ef places in the Scriptures that speaks of castin' lots, still times is different now, and people is different, and p'raps ef David and Nancy was alive now they would think different, and do different. Nancy might be jest a leetle less sot in her opinions, and then ag'in, p'raps David might give in for her conscience sake ef not for his own."

And Uncle Dan'l walked across the street and carefully cut a bunch of budding lilacs, saying to himself, "The last time, I 'spose, as the old place is goin', and a block is to be put up on the ground. Nancy shall have one more bunch of white roses and lilacs, and I will be patient a little while longer, for there is a land where David will be my brother and I shall have my sister again, and where there ain't no lotteries."

SISTER'S TRICK

But All Came Out Right

How a sister played a trick that brought rosy health to a coffee fiend and an interesting tale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, physical wreck, yet clinging to the poison that stole away my strength, because for a fleeting moment it stimulated my weakened powers. I mocked Postum, and would have none of it.

"One day my sister, Mrs. U. S. Showalder, substituted a cup of crisp, hot Postum for my morning cup of coffee, but did not tell me what it was. I noticed the richness of it, and remarked that the coffee tasted fine, but my sister did not tell me I was drinking Postum, for fear I might not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me Postum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, more tireless, got a better color to my sallow cheeks, and a clearness to my eyes; then she told me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthening life-saver she had given me in place of my morning coffee. From that time I became a disciple of Postum, and no words can do justice to the good this cereal drink can do. I will not try to tell it, for only after having used it can one be convinced of its merits." Name given by Postum Co.,

METHODISTS IN CONFERENCE

As announced in this journal last week, the result of the earlier ballots for the election of bishops by the Methodist Episcopal General Conference at Los Angeles, Calif., was the election of Drs. J. F. Berry, Henry Spellmeyer, William F. McDowell, James W. Bashford, William Burt, Luther B. Wilson, and Thomas B. Neely. On the fourteenth ballot, Dr. James R. Day, Chancellor of the Syracuse University, was elected to fill the eighth place on the Board of Bishops.

DR. T. B. NEELY

As early as the fourth ballot, Dr. Day had withdrawn his name as a candidate, but each of the following ballots had indicated the desire on the part of a large number of the delegates for his election.

Two days after his election, Dr. Day appeared before the Conference and announced that he had decided not to accept the appointment. He said:

"Since my election I have thought of nothing but my duty to the Church of which you are the representatives. Now, my dear brethren, I have reached my decision, after opening my mind prayerfully to appeals of duty from every side and to every source of help possible to me. I am not influenced by matters of material welfare. I wish to make it clear that there has been no coercion by the Board of Trustees of Syracuse University, and that financial consideration does not in any way enter into this question. I cannot conscientiously say, in view of many serious and perplexing problems, that I should take upon myself the office and work of a bishop. I feel deeply moved to continue in the work of Christian education. If I am mistaken it is not because I have not been willing and anxious to know and do the will of God, for I know there is neither safety nor success in following any but the Divine voice."

The announcement caused general surprise, for only once before in the history of the Church had a bishop-elect resigned before his consecration. It was, however, received with respect, as the decision had clearly been the result of careful and prayerful consideration. The Conference then resolved to postpone indefinitely the election of an eighth bishop.

The four Missionary Bishops elected were Dr. John E. Robinson and Dr. William F. Oldham for Southern Asia; Dr. Merri- man C. Harris, for Korea and

DR. W. F. McDOWELL

Japan; and Dr. Isaiah B. Scott, for Africa. Dr. Robinson's election will be especially gratifying to readers of this journal, because of the valuable services he rendered in the administration of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Fund during the great Famine.

An important decision was reached by the Committee on Benevolences, which reported to the Conference in favor of consolidating all the work in three great departments: First, the Board of Foreign Missions; Second, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension; and Third, the Board of Education, comprising Sunday Schools and the Freedmen's Aid. It is expected that the report will give rise to one of the most intense debates of the whole Conference, as the colored delegates are understood to be vigorously opposed to the consolidation.

One of the most interesting reports presented to the Conference was that on the work in Africa from Bishop Hartzell. He pleaded most earnestly for financial help in the vast work to which he is assigned. A thrilling passage was that in which he described a midnight reverie in the African solitudes. He said:

DR. HENRY SPELLMEYER

I recall an hour at night during my first trip in Angola. I had been in the hammock all day, and was weary and could not sleep. Walking out of my tent and passing beyond the sleeping forms of my faithful black carriers lying on the ground. I was alone. The stillness was oppressive, and was made more so to me by the very stars, which in the tropics seem to hang out like lamps in the clear sky. A feeling of unspeakable loneliness came over me. Where was I? What was my mission? How was I equipped to do my work? And the reply came: I am in a heathen continent, and was sent to take the Gospel to its heathen multitudes; and yet to care for thirty men, women and children, a remnant of my predecessor's self-supporting work in that region, and to reorganize the work, I had the pittance of a few thousand dollars. It seemed to me as if my heart would break. But I remembered I was in the path of duty, and a great peace, that has never left me, came into my soul. Then the grip of a mighty faith in God took possession of me, and that too abides.

Bishop Warne's report of the work of the Methodist Church in India was full of hope and enthusiasm. That Church had to bear the brunt of the labor connected with the famine, and it is now reaping the reward which has come from service well performed. A large portion of the funds raised by this journal was distributed by Methodist missionaries, their stations being far the most numerous in the afflicted districts. The benevolence of that trying time has opened the way to the hearts of the people. Bishop Warne says: "Remarkable as has been the growth of our work during the past quadrennium, that alone does not measure the full depth of our reasons for gratitude. The future opens before us with brighter promise than ever before. In the beginning of our work in India we had to search diligently to find the inquirer, but now we are sought for by inquirers."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—REV. JOSHUA H. SOBEY, the veteran American missionary in San Jose, Costa Rica, C. A., writes hopefully of his work at Bocas del Toro and Panama. In the latter he has been conducting services among the laborers.

—EVANGELIST L. SHELLHORN, of Ashland, N. J., recently closed a week of impressive services in Hamilton Ave. M. E. Church, Paterson, N. J. On Sunday April 10, the entire Sunday School knelt at the altar.

A Parable from Japan

In a certain place there was once an extraordinary dunce by the name of Chokichi. Now, there are very many dunces in this world, but this particular fellow was a most accomplished dunce. In the matter of forgetting things he was a perfect genius.

"One day his mistress said to him: 'Chokichi, this is the anniversary of the death of our principal ancestor, and his reverence the priest will be here before long. Therefore we must have the customary offerings ready to set before the household gods. So hurry to the market and buy me some carrots, dock, wild potatoes, mushrooms, and lotus root—these five things.'

"With this she gave him five farthings, and Chokichi, with an exclamation of assent, girded up his loins and started off.

"As he was hurrying along to market on a dog-trot, he met his neighbor Chomatsu.

"'Hello, Chokichi!' said the latter; 'you are in a great hurry. What are you after and where are you going, anyhow?'

"'To market to buy some things,' answered Chokichi, as he hurried on.

"'Well, what are you going to buy?'

"'What am I going to buy? I don't know, I'm sure,' was the reply.

"So the story goes. This forgetting the important business that his mistress had sent him on, and only racing in the street—it was a great piece of folly, was it not?

"And yet this Chokichi is not to be heedlessly laughed at. For while it may not be true of this audience, yet in certain distant parts of the country there are many people who forget the essential thing, just as Chokichi did; whereas, so far as other matters are concerned, they know everything about them. If you don't believe it, ask anybody.

"Here, Hachibei! [The speaker addresses an imaginary character.] They tell us that everything born into this world has a commission from heaven. For example, take the cow and the horse—what were they born for? And Hachibei will answer, 'Why, anybody knows that! They were born to carry heavy loads and to save folks labor.' But the cock, what was he born for? Ask him that, and he will tell you, 'He was born to tell the hours.' The dog, what was he born for? 'He is to guard the gate.' But the cat, what is she for? 'She is to catch rats.' Ask anything you please, so far as general matters are concerned, and he knows all about them. Well, then, Hachibei, you yourself, what were you born into this world for? But Hachibei will scratch his head, and finally answer, 'What was I born for? I don't know. Most likely I came just to eat rice and find fault.' For us to think that man alone came into this world to wander purposeless—that is for us to belong to the foolish fellowship of Chokichi. . . . It is man alone that has not come into this world just to eat rice and to grow old. Man is called the lord of the universe; of all things he is chief. He is not like the dog or the cat. It is not for him to wander aimlessly.

"But let us go on with our story. Chokichi reached the market-place at last, but he had quite forgotten what he came to buy. And so, as he was loafing around the place, with the money in his hand, he caught sight of some cakes in a shop-window. Forthwith he bought and ate about a dozen of them. Then he loitered here and loitered there; he drank a little wine and loafed in the grog-shop. He spent every one of his five farthings, buying things in the street and eating them on the spot. And then he went home grumbling to himself:

"'It wasn't enough? Mistress didn't give me coppers enough! And so I can't get any fried eels or duck-hash!'

"Now, when he got home, maybe his master and mistress weren't waiting for him! And maybe they weren't hot!

"'Look here, Chokichi, what have you been doing? Have you brought what you were sent for?'

"When they said this, Chokichi answered, in a dazed sort of way:

"'No, I haven't brought anything at all.'

"'But what have you done with the money we gave you?'

"'Oh, the money!' said he; 'why, I spent it all for things to eat in the street; only it wasn't nearly enough.'

"Master and mistress sat completely dumb. At length they broke out:

"'Why, what are you thinking about? The five farthings—don't you understand? We didn't tell you to spend them in any such way as that! You were to buy carrots, and dock, and the rest! But instead of buying what we need, you spend them in stuffing yourself, and then on top of that you tell us that you haven't enough! You must be a perfect fool!'

"And they stormed and scolded away.

"Now, dunces are beyond redemption.

"'Why!' said Chokichi, with a look of utter amazement, 'do you want some carrots and some dock? If that is what you want, I've just been to the market, and why didn't you tell me so? That would have been the very time to get them.'

"Well! well! He was an accomplished dunce! And in the wide world one could hardly find a master that would keep such a fellow for five minutes. So in the end there was nothing to do but send him away with two or three cuffs across the head. However, it is quite useless for any of you to hear a story of this kind and merely roar over it. This is nothing less than a parable. And with the words of Confucius on our lips, 'If I see folly, I look within myself,' to-day both you and I should well consider whether we too do not belong to the company of this Chokichi.

"In the first place, we received at birth from our Master these admirable bodies that we call the five members. We were provided with what we call the five senses, far more precious than the five farthings—the five functions of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting and feeling. In our hearts, likewise, we received at birth the five virtues of love, justice, courtesy, wisdom and truth. And the real meaning is simply this: Heaven desires to have us buy what we call the five relations—the carrots and the dock, which are these five things: obedience to parents, loyalty to masters, concord between husband and wife, harmony among brothers, and a mutual fidelity in our intercourse with others. And yet, quite forgetting the essential business of the five rules or doctrines, day and night we spend our time in nothing but this buying and eating things in the street, with its, 'I want this—I want that—that will not do—or, there is not enough of this!' Why, is not this Chokichi? It was not to wander about thus purposeless that we were born."

I. F. "God is ever near to me and helps me from hour to hour. He has heard my many prayers and answered many times."

ARTISTIC MEMORIALS

Two Points are to be considered in purchasing a memorial:

1. Durability
It should be of such material as to stand for all time, resisting all weather, and being a permanent record.

2. Artistic Beauty
When you buy a memorial, you want the handsomest, most artistic one you can get for the money you invest.

It can be easily demonstrated to your satisfaction that are more enduring than the best of granite. Marble is such a fallure that some cemeteries now prohibit its use.

White Bronze Monuments

As for artistic beauty and cost our designs will speak for themselves. We can certainly give you a far handsomer monument than you can get in granite for the same money.

Distance is no obstacle. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. We have hundreds of

at all prices from a few dollars up. If in need of cemetery work of any kind write us for designs and prices, stating about what expense you anticipate.

Bearing Discouragement*

MANY people in former times, and in heathen lands in our own time, have wondered at the sublime heroism displayed by men and women, who were generally regarded as weak, timid and retiring in disposition. It was amazing, for example, how the Chinese converts, during the recent Boxer troubles, resolutely faced death for Christ's sake. During the horrors of the Inquisition, it was noticed that the bravest sufferers, were, in many cases, physically weak. Men and women who might be crushed by a blow, dared defy powerful tyrants. No less remarkable, is to witness the fortitude displayed in some homes. Sometimes a fierce peril will brace the nerves in a time of public excitement, and will make the weakest brave; but it needs heroism of a higher order to bear the daily taunts, the cruel sneers, the savage threats uttered in the privacy of the home. There are some women whose lives are a living death; yet they go on doing the daily round of duty, cheerful, gentle, affectionate to husband and children. How is it that they can do this? They endure, because they see him who is invisible. "They look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen." He whom they serve, gives them to eat of the hidden manna, and, in the strength that it gives, they bear and work.

Strange that faith should have such power, yet there are too many instances of it to allow of doubt. The firm conviction that Christ sees and knows, and that He approves, is the secret comfort that keeps the sufferer true and unsubdued. Rather than lose Christ's approval, pain, ignominy, scorn, are borne patiently. It is not the hope of reward that buoy up the spirit. There is no reward that could compensate for such suffering as some people endure. It is the consciousness of doing right, of the sympathy and love of Christ, which impart strength. To do his will, to be patient as he was, this is the achievement which gives peace amid the storm.

We faint not. The story of Luther's talk with his wife has been often told, but still bears repetition. Harassed by opposition from the Pope and the Roman Catholic princes; disheartened by disaffection among his own supporters, he came home almost in despair. His wife seeing him so cast down, affected to be herself in distress. She told him that she had heard that God was dead. Luther was shocked at her apparent flippancy, and told her that it was impossible that God should die. "Why, then," she asked, "are you so cast down? If God lives, can he not take care of you, and of his own cause?"

The same spirit of faith. The faith that has supported martyrs in all ages was exemplified in China by a humble convert. The Boxers seized and dragged him to a temple. There they bade him burn incense before an idol, with the alternative of death. "Kill me if you will," he said, "Jesus died for me and I am ready to die for him if he so wills, but I will never deny him." They tried to terrify him with their knives, but he was firm, and at last they struck off his head.

The inward man is renewed. An infidel in Birmingham, England, had a Christian wife, a small, weak woman, in striking contrast to her burly husband. He determined at all costs to break down her religious faith. He argued with her and abused her, but she remained firm. He was the more exasperated by her firmness in this matter, because she was usually so submissive. He tried various plans to break her spirit, one of which was to lock her in the house on the Lord's day, so that she could not go to church. He rightly thought that the words she heard from the pulpit encouraged her in her resistance to his will. To his surprise, however, he found her still determined, and though he beat her he could not subdue her spirit. God was giving her the strength she needed. Finally, he gave up the struggle, owned himself beaten, and permitted her to go her own way. He told the story himself when, a few years later, in answer to her prayers, he was converted.

The Valley of Peace

THEY recall no more grim war's alarms,
Forgotten are shot and shell,
That rent and tore. For calmly now
In the Valley of Peace they dwell.

Long years have fled: long gone the day,
When bravely fighting, they fell,
Those soldiers true. Their strivings o'er,
In the Valley of Peace they dwell.

Near the Valley of Peace, the Hills of Joy
In grandeur arise, and tell
Of brave deeds done, ere the soldiers came In the Valley of Peace to dwell.

How a Gospel Mission Grew

SEVEN years ago William A. Miller, a devout Christian and an employee in the Brooklyn Post-office, opened a mission in a somewhat neglected part of that city, on Pulaski Street, near Reid Avenue, in the Eastern district. The first meeting was held in an empty store, and a deposit of two dollars was given before the place could be secured. At the end of the first year another room was added, and at the close of the second year an old stable adjoining was transformed into a hall large enough to accommodate the increased attendance at the services.

It was a story of small beginnings, that grew under constant blessings. Mr. Miller soon gathered around him a band of Christian workers, who labored earnestly in the meetings and at the street services. During the past seven years no mission in Eastern Brooklyn has been more successful or far-reaching in results than the Gospel Mission House, as it is called. It has been instrumental in doing much good. Tramps, drunkards, and the careless and indifferent, have been led to Christ, and are now working to save others. Lives have been transformed in this humble mission, whose meetings are carried on all the year round. Hardly a night passes without some poor wanderer coming forward and asking to be prayed for.

The Left-Handed Moros

TO judge Moros by inflexible Occidental standards of motives and morals (writes Chaplain C. C. Bateman) is to lose at once the key to the situation. The very structure of their language differentiates them from ourselves. Verbs are in the passive voice. The man who was slashed and killed provoked the trouble. The under dog in the fight is always the aggressor. The thief is not blamed for "finding" things lying about at loose ends; the man who lost the property is the real criminal—besides, he is a fool. If he were a sensible man, he would have exercised vigilance against the approach of the thief. Moros reverse everything. Like all Orientals, they venerate the past and their folklore; myths and legends abound in tales not unlike those of the Arabian Nights Entertainment. They turn to the left of the road, extend the left hand naturally in greeting, and the scribes write from right to left, turning the paper sideways, as any left-handed man would do. A witty officer explained that the preference for the left was due to the desire to keep the right hand free in the event a stranger should need something done to him. The "explanation" may not be far from the truth.

TURN OVER TIME

When Nature Hints About the Food

When there's no relish to any food, and all that one eats doesn't seem to do any good, then is the time to make a turn over in the diet, for that's Nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the kind required.

"For a number of years I followed railroad work, much of it being office work of a trying nature. Meal times were our busiest, and eating too much and too quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants, these, together with the sedentary habits, were not long in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble, which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

"There was little relish in any food, and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the poorer I got, and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten.

"Then I commenced a fair trial of Grape-Nuts, and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong, and with satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness, or distress, as before.

"I have been following this diet now for several months, and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Grape-Nuts with complete satisfaction and much improvement in health and brain power.

"American people undoubtedly eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion, and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated in nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A VALUABLE PUBLICATION.

The Pennsylvania Railroad 1904 Summer Excursion Route Book.

On June 1 the Passenger Department of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will publish the 1904 edition of the Summer Excursion Route Book. This work is designed to provide the public with descriptive notes of the principal summer resorts of Eastern America, with the best routes for reaching them, and the rates of fare. It contains all the principal seashore and mountain resorts of the East, and over seventeen hundred different routes or combinations of routes. The book has been compiled with the greatest care, and altogether is the most complete and comprehensive handbook of Summer travel ever offered to the public.

The cover is handsome and striking, printed in colors, and the book contains several maps, presenting the exact routes over which tickets are sold. The book is profusely illustrated with fine half-tone cuts of scenery at the various resorts and along the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

On and after June 1 this very interesting book may be procured at any Pennsylvania Railroad ticket office at the nominal price of ten cents, or, upon application to Geo. W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station Philadelphia, Pa., by mail for twenty cents.

Indians Turn to Farming

STUDENTS of Indian affairs are delighted with the recent government proclamation, which orders that so much of the land of the Camp McDowell abandoned military reservation as has not been legally settled upon, be set aside and reserved for the use and occupancy of the Mohave-Apaches, now living there, and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may afterwards find necessary to place there. This proclamation fulfils a pledge made to the Indians a quarter of a century ago, and brings to an amicable close the standing dispute between the white settlers on the McDowell lands in the Verde Valley, Arizona, and a band of Indians, between two and three hundred strong, whose original home it was, and to whom the Government had promised their return after a two score years probationary period of certified good conduct. The only people who are at all dissatisfied are eight or ten Mexicans and white men, who had settled upon this land despite the warnings of the custodian, and S. J. Holsinger, Special Agent of the Interior Department. These people had made some improvements of value, but they will be permitted to move whatever is portable, and though legally trespassers, Governor Brodie has requested the Government to pay them for such improvements as they cannot take with them.

The land now secured to the Indians consists of about three hundred acres, embracing the immediate site of the old camp, containing some adobe buildings and a good artesian well, the post garden, the United States Government farm, and the lands lying north of the old camp, containing the old Government irrigation ditch and the target practice grounds.

These Mohave-Apaches at McDowell, have kept faith with the Government and their own consciences, in spite of an extremely discouraging situation.

"Over twenty-five years ago," said good-looking, matronly Mary, wife of Mohave Frank, one of the interpreters of the tribe, "when General Crook put us on the San Carlos reservation, he tell our fathers, 'be good Indians, be soldiers, scouts, whatever we ask, and bime by, maybe twenty years, you go back to your own land.' So we do as we say. We keep peace. We help catch Geronimo. We go to school. We learn to work and live as white people live. Now we come back. White people take our land, our fathers' land, and all the water. We wait long time now. We want to build houses, have stove, table, chair. Live clean like white people and own our land. We poor. No money. Sometimes we hungry. No water, no home," and she waved her hand toward the miserable brush tepee on the barren hills, where her remnant of a conquered race waited for the government to redeem its pledges. "Hungry," as she said, receiving no rations from the government, shifting for the most miserable kind of an existence, while the white and Mexican trespassers, occupied and raised their harvests on all the fruitful part of the reservation, it is small wonder, if, at times, there has been evidence of a nocturnal visit on the potato patch or cornfields of their white neighbors, or that their shaggy ponies have occasionally helped themselves to the white man's hay. But would the white men have done any better? As a rule, these Apache-Mohaves have proved themselves exceptionally honest.

Contrary to general opinion, the Apache has some excellent traits, which, wisely directed, will show good results in the next generation, if not in this. They are not loafers, beggars nor drones from choice. All they have asked, is the land promised them, with water privileges and the necessary farming implements and seeds to give them a start, and to enable them to become self supporting. Already, under the direction of Rev. Mr. Gill, who has been appointed farmer in charge of the new reservation, they have started work. The Apaches are naturally good financiers, shrewd and keen at a bargain.

The women are expert basket weavers, showing great skill and artistic sensibility in the designs and the intricacy of the weave. They are natural musicians, too, and, like the men, are able to draw plaintive melodies from the flutes and stringed instruments which they make from hollow wood. Since they have had schools and teachers on the large reservations, they have learned to make for themselves skirts and waists of gay calico, banded with red about the bottom. They bang their hair just above the eyes and cut it off square at the shoulders. They are inordinately fond of beads, and wear them in masses over their shoulders around their necks. Just at present a big jew's-harp, suspended from a string of beads about the neck, is deemed the acme of elegance, while a string of little bells, around the leg just below the knee, has the cachet of Dame Fashion, in Apache land.

A petition sent by the Mohave-Apaches to Washington, closes with these earnest words, "We desire nothing more than that we may be enabled to become self-supporting, self-respecting and independent American citizens." While the number of acres just allotted by the Government for their settlement seems small, the Rev. Mr. Gill has already supplemented it by the purchase from his own means, of 160 acres and is settling Indians thereon, and the hope is expressed by the president of the National Indian Association, that private benevolence will provide for a further purchase. With homes assured, there is little reason to doubt that these Indians will turn their hands to the plough, and soon become a happy, prosperous people.

EMMA PADDOCK TELFORD.

Layman's View of the Problem of the Poor

IN your issue of May 4, you submit this question to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "How can the poor be helped most effectually?" The answer is very simple, though I doubt my ability to state it in such a manner as will carry conviction to the many. All efforts have hitherto failed to be of any permanent benefit, and all must fail until the cause of poverty is removed. The Salvation Army was the greatest, best directed, most far-reaching effort ever made, yet it must be acknowledged that it was pitifully insufficient.

What is the cause of poverty? This is so plain and palpable to me, that I cannot understand why everyone else does not see and acknowledge it. It is the foundation stone on which society, our civilization we boastfully call it, is built up—competition. A continuous, life-long fight, each individual against every other individual, except where several combine, like packs of wolves, to enable them to prey upon others more surely and more securely. And these have no heart or conscience. They commit any act of oppression and cruelty, and then say, "Oh, I didn't do it, the 'pack' did it." I might give many illustrations of this, but I am afraid of the editor's dictum, "too long—waste basket!"

We must acknowledge that this system of competition is according to the laws of nature. We find it not only in the animal kingdom, among the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, the fishes of the sea, but in the vegetable kingdom also; plants and trees struggling for room, for light, for life, withering, blighting, destroying their neighbors. This is called, "the survival of the fittest," in other words, the trampling to death of the weak. This is according to the laws of nature; God made those laws, therefore they are right, and we should live by them. That's good logic, according to the wisdom of this world; but the only proof I have of the Divinity of Christ, the truth of his teaching, and, therefore, his power to save, is this—that his doctrines are contrary to the laws of nature; so far above all human thought that they never could have been conceived in the brain of man, "for the carnal (natural) mind, is enmity against God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed, can be." Instead of war, Christ teaches peace; instead of self-interest, self-sacrifice; instead of contention, brotherly love; instead of competition, co-operation.

Here, then, is the answer to your question. To effectually help the poor we must change our system of competition to co-operation. How so radical a change can be effected is another question. The difficulties are so tremendous, the dangers, or apparent dangers, so great, that one is appalled. Still it must be admitted that a system that permits men, women and children to starve to death, or suffer hunger, or to be without good, wholesome food or sufficient clothing and fuel, whether from lack of work, or disability from sickness, old age or mere triflingness—such system is evidently wrong, unchristian, inhuman.

Some may call this socialism. I don't care what it is called, it is right, and no more than right in the sight of God, according to the teachings of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom be praise forever and ever. Hawks Park, Fla. J. P. WILKINSON.

A Veteran in Good Works

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:—I am an old subscriber. The first thing I do after the mail arrives is to look over THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I value it next to my Bible. I am living on borrowed time, being now in my eightieth year. I erected the family altar fifty-two years ago, and during all this time the Lord has wonderfully blessed me. I have superintended a Sunday School for fifty-two consecutive years. I am old, but not too old to work for the good Lord. My wife is in her seventy-sixth year, and attends Sunday School whenever convenient. May God bless all workers engaged in the Sunday School work; we are a large army. They who trust in the Lord shall not want any good thing. Friedensburg, Schuylkill County, Pa. A. S. RILAND.

RESURRECTION LIFE

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR beloved Lord yielded up his life that he might take it again. He laid it down for our sakes, but, oh, the wondrous marvel of it! he should also have taken it again for us! "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised for our justification" (Rom. 4: 25). Loving hands took down the lifeless body of the Lord, and laid it in Joseph's new tomb, in a winding-sheet which he provided. And Joseph rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre. But it was the burial of One who had power to take his life again, and the stone was not to remain on the door of the sepulchre unmoved. Man's attempts to keep the Saviour in the grave were futile. The angel who had terrorized the guard by a word of comfort for the women who had come to visit the sepulchre. He said to them, "Fear not ye"—let them fear—"I know that ye seek Jesus which was crucified." He is not here; for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay." It was a wondrous message; they had been more occupied with death than with resurrection, for they bought spices and ointments which they had prepared (Luke 23: 56; 24: 1; no doubt to keep the sacred body from decay. And now they find an empty tomb, and an angel—not the Roman guard—in possession!

Are we, like those women, occupied with a dead Saviour? The women were eager enough to do something for him. This is human nature. But it was a needless task which they imposed upon themselves; and very much of our doing is of this order. Jesus wanted these women to believe, not to do. He wanted them to apprehend him as the Risen One, and to learn to have to do with more than for him. And he wants us now to have our conversation in heaven; in close touch with a Saviour in the place of power, at the right hand of God. Not taken up by circumstances and things around us, but with what God means by them; what his plans and what his will and power for the present moment is. God would have us live looking up, and live as those who are at home where Christ is, in heaven; having really, not nominally, our conversation in heaven, from whence we look for our Lord.

Christ was not only raised again for our justification; it is Christ as our power which is also secured by the position of our Saviour, the God-man, at the right hand of God. How does that mighty working of God in Christ's resurrection affect us? On the answer to this question hangs the whole of our Christian life. It is of infinite importance. Let us look into it in much prayer, looking to the blessed Holy Spirit to make real to us what we read or hear.

When we consider how weak we are against the power of Satan over our spirit, soul, or body, and how much mightier he is than we, we may well be discouraged; but, if we fully take by faith the place which God has given us, in Christ, in the heavenly places, then we have not to reckon on what we are, but what Christ is in heaven; and to remember that God sees us in Him up there. "I cannot endure the rasping of such a Christian's spirit; I try, and am always conquered; I cannot love her, I cannot speak kindly to her; it would be hypocrisy," says one. And it is true: you cannot. But he is "far above" this trial, and he can do what you cannot. He sees in that one, so difficult to you, a soul for whom he has suffered, one whom he is bearing upon his heart before the throne. You are in him, and in him above that temptation. Look at him! He can bear with her; and you are in him. Praise him that you are in him and that she is in him, and you will find love to her kindling in your heart.

"I have insurmountable difficulties," says another. "My business is in an impossible tangle; I am getting deeper and deeper involved. I have done all I can, and am helpless." And he is on the throne, and tells you to sit with him in victory.

SOLID GOLD RINGS with GENUINE DIAMONDS, PEARLS, OPALS, EMERALDS, RUBIES and TURQUOISE at ONE-QUARTER the PRICES CHARGED by OTHERS

OUR WONDERFUL OFFER:
SELECT ANY SOLID GOLD RING here on. Illustrated order by number, enclose our special offer price, together with 10 cents extra for postage and registry fee, and to insure a perfect fit cut a narrow strip of paper or a string so the ends will just meet around the finger on which the ring is to be worn, and immediately upon receipt of your order, we will send the ring to you by registered mail, postpaid, with the understanding and agreement that if the ring isn't perfectly satisfactory, a perfect fit, one of the most beautiful mountings you have ever seen, the finest stone of the kind you have ever seen, and the quality of any ring you can buy elsewhere AT THREE TO FOUR TIMES OUR PRICE, you can return the ring to us by registered mail at our expense, and we will immediately RETURN YOUR MONEY, including postage.

EVERY RING illustrated hereon is guaranteed the finest solid gold, the very finest new mounted, or colored, such work is of the highest grade made. The stones are all especially fine, every stone guaranteed. They all have extra heavy shanks; strong, heavy, and guaranteed fine solid gold through and through.

THE COST TO US of each ring represents, first, gold, so much per pennyweight, the first cost of importing the stones, diamonds, pearls, rubies, emeralds, opals, etc.; the cost of melting, mounting, shaping and finishing in our own shop; and with our one small percentage of profit added, we name a price about one-fourth the price charged by others, a very small percentage above the actual cash market value of the ring, the old gold value and stone value.

OUR BUY BACK OFFER. The intrinsic value of in each of these rings so closely approaches our selling price that we make this exceptional offer: If you order one or more of these rings at the special price named, we will bargain and agree to take back from you, at any time within five years, any ring you may purchase and allow you what you paid for it, less 10 per cent; for example, if you buy our finest ring, No. 310, with ruby and emerald doublets, at $8.00, we will buy the ring back from you at any time within five years and pay you $7.20. NO SUCH VALUE WAS EVER BEFORE OFFERED. Our price barely covers the intrinsic or market value of the gold and the stones, a price you can get for them any time almost anywhere, with but a comparatively few cents added for making and mounting and only our one small profit.

The above illustration, engraved from a photograph, will give you a general idea of the appearance of the twenty-four special fine solid gold rings which we are offering in beautiful settings as below described.

PUZZLE No. XI.

ON an island in the Pacific is a famous volcano, its crater a vast pit one thousand feet deep. By a rocky, zigzag path one may descend to the centre, which is a lake of molten lava. The superstitious islanders, who named this lake Halemauau, "the house of everlasting burning," stood in awe of the goddess of fire, and at the first signs of an eruption threw living animals into the crater to appease her wrath. A native princess, who became a Christian, resolved to defy the goddess, and thus free the people, if possible, from this superstition. Many of her friends, having explored her in vain to give up so dangerous an undertaking, went with her a journey of one hundred miles to the crater. Arriving, she hurled stones into the lake of lava, and said, "Jehovah is my God. He kindled these fires. I have no fear of the fire goddess. If I perish by her anger, you may fear her power, but if Jehovah saves me, you must worship him." Then the company knelt while prayer was offered, and the crater rang with the music of a Christian hymn. They returned safely, not followed by the avenging wrath of the fire goddess. A well-known English writer in one of his books pays a tribute to this princess, who is regarded as one of the world's heroines.

S. W. F. Cleveland, O. Will the saints eat and drink in heaven?

We know very little of the conditions of life in heaven, and cannot tell how much of that we do know is literal, and how much figurative. We cannot conceive of a disembodied spirit eating and drinking. Yet Christ's words (Luke 22:30), "That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom," and similar passages, appear to indicate the possibility of there being some kind of repast in the heavenly kingdom.

E. G. S. Granite Falls, Wash. A local ordinance, recently adopted, regulating the construction of chimneys, flues, etc., is meeting with severe opposition among the residents of the town, as it works hardship to the poorer class and is a gross injustice to those who have good buildings already constructed. Does it not come within the scope of ex post facto law as interpreted in the Crown Encyclopedia?

The authority of the town council to adopt the ordinance, depends upon the terms of some law of the State of Washington, which is not before me. Every State has such laws, however, and probably the Washington Legislature has already passed an Act, under which the town is proceeding. The ordinance is reasonable, as it seems to me, and not unusual. It comes under what is called the "Police Power" of the State, and would be held constitutional, as an exercise of that power. The objection that the law is ex post facto, would be good, if an attempt were made to punish for a breach committed before the ordinance was passed. For instance, if a man were fined for kindling a fire last winter in a stove, the pipe of which was not properly guarded, the fine would undoubtedly be remitted on appeal. The ordinance acts only prospectively, i. e., on acts committed after it was adopted. But if, after the ordinance was passed, a man kindles a fire, with a stove-pipe not properly guarded, as per the ordinance, then he commits an offence to which the rule of ex post facto law does not apply.

G. H. CRAWFORD.

C. A. H. Calais, Me. Is it true that in the early church the Lord's Supper was celebrated every Sunday?

It appears to have been the common practice. The expression (Acts 20:7), "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread" implies a regular weekly celebration. Pliny, describing the habits of Christians in his day (Book 10, Epist. 97), implies the same rule. Acts 2:46 seems to indicate that at first there was a daily celebration, but it is not certain.

W. N. P. 1. Why is the Jewish quarter of New York called "The Ghetto"? 2. What part of New York is "Bohemia"? 3. Why the name of "Gotham"?

1. The name is Italian, and is borrowed from the Ghetto of Rome, Frankfurt-on-Main, and other European cities where it is employed to designate the lower Jewish quarter. The first European Ghetto (and the first so-called), was established in Rome in 1556. 2. That portion of New York's population which includes a certain class of writers, artists, sculptors, musicians, and players, is known as the Bohemian element. Thus, the location of Bohemia may change, as the Bohemian element moves from one quarter to another. The name originally came from the gypsies or traveling Bohemians, who lived by their wits. 3. It is an old nickname that has stuck to New York since colonial days. It was popularized by Washington Irving in his writings.

Constant Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. I find myself confused in prayer by my ideas of the Trinity. Is it wrong to address prayer to Christ, of whom I can conceive, rather than to the Father, who, being spirit, is inconceivable?

There are probably few Christians who have not at times experienced the same difficulty. An explanation of the doctrine of the Trinity, even if it could be given, would not help you. There is, however, a practical outcome, which may be suggested. Christ is represented by Paul as an expression of God, and by John as the Word. That is he manifested God, doing exactly what you express the need of. He became God in human form, so that we might understand something of the nature of God. The Father thus showed his love for the human race in stooping to our capacities. In all that we reverence in Christ, his sweet compassion, his sympathy with suffering, his magnanimity to his assailants, he showed us something of the infinite depths of the same attributes in the Father. He was so thoroughly one with the Father, that in worshipping him we are worshipping the Father, inasmuch as he represents the Father to us. It is not wrong to address in prayer the Son or the Holy Spirit, any more than in addressing a human being you may appeal to his reason and try to convince him, or to his emotions or affections, and try to influence him. Man himself is a trinity in unity.

L. A. D., Springfield, Mass. Who was the author of the poem, "An Ode to God," commencing: "O thou Eternal One, whose present height?"

It was written by Gabriel Romanovitch Derzhavin, a celebrated Russian statesman, 1743-1816, and translated by Bowring. It can be found in Funk & Wagnall's Library of Religious Poetry.

C. B., Wafello, Pa. 1. What is habit? 2. What is pain in a physiological sense? 3. Is this quotation correct: "True religion resides in the will alone"?

1. Habit is tendency or inclination toward action, course or condition, which, by repetition, becomes easy, spontaneous, or even unconscious. Thus, once accustomed to a certain course of action, it becomes a second nature. In philosophy and theology, it is the trend or tendency of thought, the mental disposition. 2. The reverse of pleasure or agreeable sensation. The result of mental, nervous or material derangement, strain or other abnormal condition. 3. The apprehension of religious truth may and often does come involuntarily and as a revelation. There must, however, be the will or determination to accept religious truth. Hence the will in this sense is indispensable. The will having assented, simple faith and trust are necessary. We must seek the Kingdom as little children.

Dr. H. M. F., Penn's Grove, N. J., writes:

In the May 25th issue, G. A. O., Custer, S. D., asks for a remedy for the tobacco habit. Prayer is a sure cure, if rightly employed. I was at a revival service conducted by Miss Lizzie Sharp. She particularly spoke of God's ability and willingness to have the taste for intoxicating liquors and tobacco destroyed in us by earnest, trusting prayer. I then and there asked God to remove the taste for tobacco in my case. From that hour to this, nearly twenty years, tobacco has had no power over me all desire is gone.

Subscriber. — 1. Is a divorced person justified in marrying again? 2. What did Christ mean by his legislation on divorce (Matt. 5:32)? 3. Do you think God would forgive a divorced person who married again, if at the time of the marriage that person intended to seek divine pardon?

1. It is evident that when one partner to a marriage is unfaithful, the other is released morally from the union, and is justified in seeking legal release. The innocent party is thus free to marry again, and is justified in doing so. It is a disputed question whether Paul's statements on the matter (I. Cor. 7:9-15) permit in cases of desertion, divorce, or only a legal separation, without the right of marrying again. The general opinion, however, now is that wilful and permanent desertion justifies divorce. 2. We believe he meant that the marriage was dissolved by the cause named, and that remarriage was justified. 3. It is not for us to limit God's mercy, but you may take it as a principle that no person has the right to do wrong in the hope of getting pardon for it afterwards.

W. A. P., Brunswick, O. (1) How can a man be angry and sin not as the apostle enjoins, Eph. 4:26? (2) Does the statement (James 1:14,15) mean that a man is responsible for his own temptations?

1. If he is angry about wicked things, his anger is not sin. If you saw anyone cruelly beating a woman, or a child, or an animal, you would be justified in feeling anger. If you saw a man tempting an innocent youth to evil and taking him into wicked places, you might be angry without sinning. Acts of injustice, or fraudulent dealing with the poor might make you angry without sin. 2. Temptation is not always a man's own fault. It comes to us from without, and unless we palter with it or yield to it we are not blamable. But there are some temptations that are the result of our own conduct. If we go into wicked places out of curiosity; if we suffer the mind to dwell on the pleasures of sin; if we associate with evil companions, we are responsible, as James says.

C. M. K., Chester Springs, Pa. Is it paying a due observance to God's house, for a pastor to give his consent for a mock trial to be held in the church in which he is pastor?

Such a proceeding in the church is sadly out of place. It should be held elsewhere, if at all.

Wesley N. Peck, Mt. Carmel, Conn., writes:

In respect to the little note in THE MAIL BAG of May 18, regarding seedless apples, I would say that no apple can be originated, or its appearance, or habits of growth changed one whit by budding, although different varieties are propagated, or perpetuated by that means. Neither can an apple, by any process of grafting, be made to grow part sweet and part sour. Any experienced horticulturist will confirm this. The apple blossom belongs to the great family known to botanists as the "Roseace," of which all the flowers are in five parts. Thus it sometimes happens that one or more parts of the blossom of an apple may be fertilized by the pollen of some other variety close by, in such a manner that certain fifths of the resultant fruit retain the individuality of that variety. The rest remaining similar to the kind that the parent tree bears. This is rare, however. If a seedless apple can be produced, of good eating and keeping qualities, it is very likely to supersede the seed kinds, as the banana and navel orange have done; and the orchardist who makes a specialty of this variety will find an unlimited market, with prices at his command.

Reader, Osceola, Nebr. Do you think it is right for a Christian young man to resort to a marriage agency to get married?

There is nothing against it, but he takes a risk in adopting such a method.

S. B., Winsted, Conn. How many national or legal holidays are there that were set apart by a special Act of Congress, or by the Legislature of the different States?

The States differ greatly in their legal holidays, but January 1, February 22, May 30, July 4, September 5, General Election Day, Thanksgiving Day and Christmas, are observed in almost all the States. There is no "national holiday"—not even July 4 or Thanksgiving, though Congress has at different times appointed special holidays.

Subscriber, Easton, O. If the dietary law, as given to the Jew, was for his physical welfare, would it not be well for us to observe it, especially when we have additional light given us by scientific research, showing that those things that were forbidden are not safe food to eat, on account of trichinosis and other forms of dangerous bacteria?

The wisdom and merit of the Jewish laws governing health, and especially as to food, are now generally admitted. The complete immunity of the Hebrew from many of the diseases that afflict other races is believed to be largely due to those laws. Though in some respects too stringent for modern ideas, their observance in any land and by any people would operate advantageously to health and longevity.

Mrs. Emma M., Olney, Ill. Please tell me the names of the three men whom the star of Bethlehem led?

According to tradition, they were Caspar, Melchior, and Balthasar.

J. B., Cottage Grove, Wis. What particular property or virtue is in the number seven and its multiples, that it is so often referred to in the Bible?

It is a symbolical number—the symbol of perfection. Thus, there are seven days in creation, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven days in the week, seven capital sins, seven graces seven divisions in The Lord's Prayer, seven "ages" in the life of man, seven phases of the moon, every seventh year was Sabbatical, and every seven times seven years the jubilee; the great feasts lasted seven days, and were held at intervals of seven weeks. The word seven is frequently used to signify completeness, or fullness of time or measure. Seven has been aptly called "the keystone on which the symbolism of number depends." It is composed of two number three and four—the first representing the threefold nature of divinity, the second the fourfold nature of humanity, and hence seven represents, symbolically, the union between God and man. The symbolical use of seven was common in Persia, ancient India, China, Egypt and Arabia.

D. A., Schenectady, N. Y. What is the population of the Philippines?

According to the census just completed by Gen. Sanger, the population of the entire group of islands is 7,635,426, of whom 647,7 are classed as wild and uncivilized. This is the first census ever taken there, the Spanish authorities having simply dealt in estimates.

Mrs. L. H. B., Skowhegan, Me. Why did Mordecai sit at the king's gate?

He probably held some office at the royal court. According to an institute of Cyrus all State officers were required to wait in the outer courts until summoned. His position, therefore, may have been one of dignity.

Subscriber, Topeka, Kan. In the May 18 issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is an article entitled "Praying Amiss," by Rev. R. J. Campbell in which we read the following: "Some may pray for others who will never pray for the selves. Here, also, are disappointments, and we read that 'Every one who asketh, receiveth. Receive what?' The very thing he asks for Christ never said that," etc. Now how shall we harmonize that with Mark 11:24, where he says, "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." John 15:7, he says, "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Also, John 16:23, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you." The are also other passages of scripture that seem to bring out the same meaning. He speaks of a "foolish prayer." What might we consider as such?

As the title of Dr. Campbell's article shows he was dealing with "Praying Amiss" alone and not with prayers that were in accordance with the Divine will. If one were to pray for wealth, or fine surroundings, could he please Christ's promise and reasonably expect fulfillment? Assuredly not. Jesus said, "Seek ye first the Kingdom." Our first and greatest requests should be for spiritual things, and we abuse the prayer privilege, we must not be surprised at not receiving what we ask for. Our Father will answer our prayers in his own way and time. "Foolish prayers," as Dr. Campbell designates them, are like the peals of children for things that would be hurtful, rather than helpful, and so they are denied, or if not denied, are granted, that lesson may be learned from the experience.

The Romance of a Young Missionary who Worked his Way to Africa

RARELY has the romance of the foreign mission field, and the strong fascination it possesses for the young heart that is fired with the zeal of Christian service, been more strikingly illustrated than in the case of A. T. Waters, whose remarkable story is given below. It is the story of a young man, who, while still a mere boy, consecrated his life to missionary work, and resolutely overcame all obstacles that stood in the way of his purpose. How he prepared for the field, and, almost penniless, pluckily worked his way by sea and land, until he reached Tongaland, and how he labored there, he has modestly related for the benefit of those who may be drawn to a performance of similar service for the Master.

His youth was spent in Canada, Ottawa being his home. Shortly after his conversion, under Mr. Moody's preaching in Chicago, in 1900, he decided to surrender himself for the foreign mission field. He studied for a time at Mount Hermon School, Mass., and then went back to business as a book-keeper in a large manufacturing firm until he had earned money to go abroad. A brief period of medical study in Ottawa completed his preparations. In December of 1897 he joined his Goshen yokefellow, Mr. F. E. Hedden, of Columbus, O. Both were relieved to go out as independent missionaries and at their own charges, and they did so.

They were set apart to the work by the Jefferson Street Church of Christ, Buffalo, N. Y. His only pledged support was five dollars per month, from a personal friend.

"Even Mr. Moody discouraged our foolhardiness in going without visible support," said young Mr. Waters. "Our cash in hand was not nearly sufficient to pay our way to South Africa, so we decided to partly work our passage. From Buffalo to New York we worked our way in charge of two car-loads of horses. We shipped for Liverpool, again in charge of horses, having to feed and water them. Rough weather prevailed; we were wet most of the time and slept among the horses. The voyage lasted thirteen days and was a severe hardship, but we thanked God for it.

"A week in Liverpool and another in London were spent vainly endeavoring to book for South Africa. We were willing to do anything, even stoking coal; but every effort failed. It was finally decided that I should go on alone to South Africa, Johannesburg being my destination. After paying steerage to Port Elizabeth and third-class by rail to Johannesburg, there remained to each, when we parted company, just eighty-nine cents."

mounted policemen and a trader. Chief Ngwanasi and his retinue came from his principal Kraal, ten miles distant, and welcomed the missionary, but much more heartily did he welcome him as a surgeon for Ngwanasi. He had a very sore foot. A blazer jacket was presented by the young missionary to the chief, in token of friendship. Ngwanasi returned the compliment later. He had forty-five wives in the household.

"Though I had enjoyed excellent health on the high veldt," writes Mr. Waters, "I immediately became subject to attacks of malarial fever, down here in the coast country. While I was weak with fever, and dragging myself about trying to fix up my new home, the Boer war broke out, ten days after my arrival. Our two white policemen and part of the native police force were called to the mountains to protect the magistracy. A few days later a native runner came in haste, bringing a message from the police, saying they were in flight before the Boers, who had destroyed the magistracy and were coming down to Maputa, and that the trader and I should flee for our lives to Delagoa Bay. My first thought was to do so, but after deliberation and prayer, I determined to remain. The trader, however, fled in the night, and did not return for a month, during which period I was the only white man in the country."

For thirteen months the general official care of the territory was left in the young missionary's hands. Chief Ngwanasi rendered good service in keeping watch of the enemy. During these troublesome times the Government added to Mr. Waters already heavy burden the two appointments of Postmaster and Border Customs Officer.

MISSIONARY LINFELD PREACHING TO A WEDDING PARTY AT A CHIEF'S KRAAL

In Africa, young Waters had many unusual experiences. An interview with Hon. Cecil Rhodes, at his beautiful home, added interest to a short call at Cape-town, which the young traveler reached, with sixty-two cents left.

On reaching Johannesburg, he took up quarters among the Kaffirs in the "Location," where he preached the Gospel to the natives, and supported himself by his medical practice among them. In the year and a half of his stay there, he acquired a knowledge of the Zulu language. He received a call, through the South Africa General Mission, to go to British Tongaland, Zululand, as pioneer missionary to that tribe, and as Government Acting District Surgeon. It took a month to get there from Durban, via Delagoa Bay. Tongaland is about fifty miles square, with a population of 10,000 or 12,000 souls. The seat of government, previously at Maputa, had recently been removed to the Lubomba Mountains, many miles distant. The young missionary was assigned a dwelling at Maputa. On his arrival, on October 5, 1899, he found only three white men there, viz: two ing watch of the enemy. During these troublesome times the Government added to Mr. Waters already heavy burden the two appointments of Postmaster and Border Customs Officer.

The Protecting Eagle

Text—Deut. 32:11, As the eagle stirreth up her nest

THE War Goddess has crowned the eagle "monarch of the air." His throne is the inaccessible cliff, his diadem the noontide sun, his footstool the morning clouds, his playground the vast expanse of infinite space. His keenness of eye, boldness of flight, sharpness of claw, merciless destructiveness of beak, cause him to be dreaded in mountainous lands, as the huge jaws and powerful claws of the lion cause him to be dreaded in the African forests.

But though the eagle has been called the "monarch of the air," as the lion has been called the "monarch of the fields," yet the eagle, like the lion, never had royal pedigree. By that word "royal," I mean a noble, brave and fearless ancestry. The eagle is not of a heroic mould. He is a cringing, fawning, contemptible coward. Though he is a raptorial bird, and loves to banquet off the quivering flesh of a newly-slain carcass, the blood which flows through his own arteries is pumped from a craven heart. In terror, this mighty-winged flyer will flee before the little king-bird, hardly larger than a bedwarfed English sparrow. Confined in a cage with a small barnyard fowl, the domestic bird has been known to make the eagle beg for mercy, as a school-yard bully will whine before an outraged youth half his size. "Many reputations are undeserved altogether," once wrote an observant naturalist. "Let us not in this connection trouble now about statesmen, poets, or authors, but take from natural history a familiar illustration, that of the eagle. The great strength of the eagle enables it to prey upon creatures that have no power of defending themselves from his terrible swoop; but we must not allow ourselves on this account, as our fathers did, to magnify him into a type of magnanimity and courage. In true courage he is not superior to most of the smaller hawks, and certainly inferior to the falcons, which will drive away this so-called 'monarch of the air' when he approaches too near their nests. So that, really, when we remember what a fame the eagle has always had for magnanimity and for courage, it is obvious in view of the facts, that he, like many other birds and men, has obtained a reputation which is undeserved."

Parental Valor

But though the eagle is a cowardly bird in reference to his own life, no sooner does he become a parent, than he is transformed into a daring, valiant protector of his young. No sooner are the dull, white-colored eggs deposited in the nest which the twain have builded upon the tops of the dizzy heights, or upon the ledge of a precipice, than the parent birds are ready to protect those nests at any cost. I remember years ago seeing a powerful picture called, "The One Strand." A mountaineer of the far-off northeast had been lowered over the side of a cliff, to rob an eagle's nest of its eggs. No sooner was he lowered by a rope over the cliff and dangling in mid-air with the surging sea hundreds of feet beneath him, beating its waves upon the jagged rocks, than the father and mother birds saw the would-be destroyer of their home. They started for their enemy. Ay, it was a royal battle, a battle for life. The eagles were circling about his head. The sturdy mountaineer was swinging his knife round and round over his head. But once he swung the knife too far. The keen edge of the blade cut the rope all but one strand. With horror-stricken eyes, he saw that strand gradually unraveling. The whole scene was so realistically portrayed, that I could almost hear the triumphant screams of the parental birds as their human enemy was about to be dashed upon the rocks below.

Yes, yes, parental affection transforms the craven bird into a fierce, intrepid champion, capable of sublime self-sacrifice in defence of its offspring. Yet in our text we find him, in spite of that tender affection, disturbing the young birds and turning them out of their home. What does the Bible mean by comparing this strange conduct with God's providential dealing? Why does God, as a loving Father, treat his children in this seemingly rough way as the eagle bird pushes her offspring? For you must remember that we do not have to go entirely to this figure of the eagle bird, to be taught the lessons that God's hand sometimes smites a loving blow, as well as gives a loving caress. In the epistle to the Hebrews, we are taught that chastisement is one of the proofs God gives us of his affection. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." In his famous Sermon upon the Mount, Christ says there is a blessing in falling tears and in persecutions and in heart-aches and in all affliction, as well as in smiles and perpetual sunshine and iridescent joys.

First, God, like the parental eagle, stirs up our nests in order that we may learn how to depend upon ourselves, as well as upon him. He plunges us into the abyss of trouble, in order that we, as fledglings, may learn to fly on and up. He tumbles us down so that we may soar higher than the cliffs upon which we are born, higher than the mountains whose bald heads are frozen amid perpetual snows, and higher than even the morning clouds that have hovered over us in many benedictions. He treats us just as a true parent should always treat his child. Some few weeks ago, I was visiting upon the ranch of a wealthy man in California. He turned and said to me: "No young man ever amounts to anything unless he is compelled to work for his own mental and physical and spiritual development. So firmly do I believe it is the mountain upon the man, and not the man upon the mountain, that brings man to the highest development for which God intended him, that I have compelled my boys to work for every cent they have received, even when they were little children. I never give them anything without a return. If they want spending money, they must earn it by painting the fences, or cutting the wood, or gathering the walnuts. If they want a gun or a riding horse, they must buy it with their own money which they have earned. I have not told them that each year they have an $8,000 income, which was left them by a dead relative, and that at twenty-one years of age they will be independently rich. I know that knowledge would ruin them. I make them work for every cent they spend. In their working, I am developing two of the finest boys in all this part of the country."

Uses of Hardship

That earthly parent is developing his children by work. Cannot we realize God is developing us spiritually, mentally and physically by work, and hard work? Why were the old Yankees, born amid the New England Hills, and the old Highlanders, born amid the Scottish heather, of the same heroic mould? We have read that in the chivalric times the Scottish crusaders were being driven back, when an old Highland chief, took from his girdle the leathern bag which encased the heart of the dead Bruce. He flung it far into the ranks of the enemy, as he cried: "Thou brave heart of a mighty Bruce, lead us on to victory! Lead us on! lead us on!" Then the fleeing Highlanders, turned and charged where the dead Bruce would have led them. Oh, how we thrill at the story of that mighty deed. But why did the Scotchmen and the Yankees of old, belong to races of giants, and the Latin people of Central America and of the Southern parts of Portugal and Spain, degenerate into a race of pygmies? Difference of blood? Perhaps. But I believe it was not so much a difference of blood, as a difference of geographical surroundings. In the Southern parts of Europe, all that the inhabitants had to do for centuries was to tickle the soil and it would laugh with plenty. While among those Northern snow-clad hills, not only did the inhabitants have to fight human enemies, but climatic ones. Any man who wrested a harvest from the New Hampshire valleys, or from the Scottish Highlands, had by necessity to be strong of brain and powerfully muscled of arm. It was the climatic obstacles which made the New Englanders and the Scottish clans the mighty men they were and are. And it is trouble, great trouble, which always develops men. The old parental eagle pushes her fledglings off the nest to teach her young how to fly. God pushes us one and all out into the abyss of fathomless trial, to teach us how to take care of ourselves. God does not want to run a perpetual nursery. He wants to make of us men and women of fully developed powers. He disturbs us from our places of ease and comfort, and thrusts us forth into scenes of conflict and difficulty, in order that we may learn to use the spiritual powers with which we are endowed, and to teach us in dire extremity what infinite resources there are in him for every one of his children who looks confidently up to him and cries, "Our Father."

Faith Developed by Trial

God again stirs up our nests and pushes us off our eyries as the eagle does its young, to show us our limitations, as well as our possibilities. The eaglet has to learn what he cannot do, as well as what he can do. He must be taught in one sense how to depend upon himself. He must be taught in another sense how he must depend upon the parent bird. The Bible, in the beautiful figure of my text, pictures the old eagle, when the right time comes, stirring up the nest and pushing her young off the cliff. Oh yes, that is beautiful; but the next statement of the verse is just as beautiful. When the young bird drops down and down, and the fluttering wings grow weaker and weaker, then the fledgling gives a faint, frightened call for help. Then what happens? Why, the old bird at once starts to rescue. Swifter than any sea-gull ever dropped in the waters to clutch a fish; swifter than ever a hawk pounced upon a chicken in the barnyard, the old mother bird starts to save her young. How? She swoops down below the fluttering eaglet, and rising with outstretched wings, receives it on her shoulders, and bears it aloft into safety. Is not this a beautiful symbol of God's care for his children. The Psalmist says, "I walketh upon the wings of the wind." Yes, that is like the eagle. He pushes us off the nest, but he does not leave us to perish. He is near, and underneath us are the everlasting arms. When we are losing our strength and cry to him, he bears us up. Do you not see the beautiful teachings of my text? "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings."

The Lesson of Dependence

The words of the text teach us that we must learn our limitations and how to trust God, and to depend upon God, as well as to learn how to depend upon ourselves. We must learn to trust ourselves to the Heavenly Father's strength and care, as the eaglet trusts to its mother bird. It is a lesson of dependence as well as of effort. I had a lesson of this kind when, with Arab guides, some years ago, I climbed the Egyptian Pyramid of Cheops. Each stone of that pyramid about five feet high and two feet wide. You give your outstretched hands to your dusky guides. They pull a push you up. Your head is dizzy with the awful abyss you can see beneath, but still they keep on pulling a pushing you up. You help them as much as you can. Without your help they could do nothing, but if you could not have their help, you would be doomed. Like the body of an English tourist who, a few years ago, tried to climb the pyramid alone, your body would soon be a mangled corpse below. As we must learn from the text the duty of depending upon ourselves, so we must also learn the duty of absolute dependence upon God.

But there is still another great lesson from the figure of an old parent eagle stirring up her nest. After the young birds have once been pushed off the eyrie and learned their own limitations, and also learned to trust the parent, then they are ready to be taught by the parent birds, by object lessons. When the eaglet or learns that if she does not obey the parent bird, she will be punished, then she will not only willingly, but after while gladly, obey what the mother and father bird teach her to do. First comes fear, then trust, then attempt to imitate and to do as the parent bird does.

Learning by Example

It has never been my privilege to see an old eagle teaching her young how to fly, but Sir Humphrey Davy, the great English chemist, once saw this interesting spectacle. He gives a full description of the scene. First, the eagles followed out exactly the picture of my text. The young birds, with fear and trembling, clung to the rocks where they were hatched. But the old birds said to themselves, "This won't do. This won't do. These young birds must be taught to fly." So the parent birds first tried to coax the young to leave the nest. Then, when coaxing accomplished nothing, they struck right and left with their beaks. With their powerful talons they scattered the nest. Then they gave the young a big push, and off the fledglings went. Then the young were carried back to the nest by the broad wings of the parent bird. The mother and father bird seemed to stop awhile to have a little talk. They seemed to say: "Now, children, you must obey me, whether you will or no. And, you must obey me, I want you to do it willingly. I want you to follow my every movement. See how I raise my wings so? I beat them in the air just so. And now I begin to circle round and round. Come, boys; come, girls. That is right. Now, try again. Are you ready? Here we go up, and up, and up. See how easy it is."

Let me describe this object lesson in almost the same language with which Sir Humphrey Davy described it, when he saw the two old eagles, by their action teaching their young how to fly above the crags of Ben Nevis. "After the old birds had coaxed the eaglets to the eyrie, they made small circles, which the young eaglets tried to imitate. Then the parent birds made larger and larger circles in a gradually ascending spiral until the birds, old and young, were finally lost to view in the great heaven of blue." Ah, yes, the old eagle teach the young eagles to fly, first, by the sharp blow of the beak and the pushing off the nest; secondly, the rescue and the bringing back to the nest; third, the object lessons, which say: "Come, children, do I am doing now. Come, lift your wings as my wing

The People's Baths, in the Heart of One of New York City's Tenement Districts

THE People's Baths (Milbank Memorial) were recently opened in East Thirty-eighth Street, New York, and judging from the crowds of men, women and children, thronging the place every day since opening, these baths were not only needed most entirely of white marble, can remain so, despite the thousands of bathers who wash and become clean within its walls.

Bath partitions and wainscot to bathing compartments are of white marble, supported on bronze legs, and trimmed overhead with a bronze moulding, carrying the wires for incandescent lights. The whole interior, while perfectly plain, is neat and cleanly in appearance.

There are a few porcelain tubs for the use of very small children who come with their mothers, and for old people; but most of the compartments are fitted with shower baths, the temperature of the water being regulated to suit the bather. The waste water is taken off in deep drains, which have one large pipe outlet for each row of showers.

Forty-five hundred bathers can be accommodated in a day at the People's Baths, allowing each person twenty minutes time. Soap and towels are furnished for five cents, and a considerable income is derived thereby, which goes toward the support of the baths. Bathers bringing their own soap and towels have all the other advantages free. Men almost invariably pay the small fee, but women and girls generally bring their own soap and towels. And such fun as the children have under the showers! It is not always a question of cleanliness with them, but of a chance for a good frolic under the showers, and judging from the squeals of delight, in different keys, which issue from the compartments when the children are splashing about, their anticipations are fully realized.

Mothers come with their little ones, who are too small to be trusted alone; boys besiege the place in droves; while workmen refresh themselves after their day's toil, with the exhilarating showers. There is no doubt that these baths will prove one of the greatest of blessings to the dwellers in this crowded section of the city. Many little ones can be saved from illness and death during the torrid heat of summer, and much comfort and strength will be given to weary mothers and hard-working fathers. Tenement-house life at best is hard, and especially in summer, when the crowded rooms are stifling with heat and overcrowding. These beautiful memorial baths, erected at a cost of nearly a million dollars—for the ground on which the building stands is immensely valuable—are the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Milbank Anderson, to the people of New York. Mrs. Anderson is a woman of many and large charities, who does not wish to become a "well-known philanthropist," and so her good works are done modestly and quietly.

When the People's Baths were formally transferred to the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, Mrs. Anderson's representative said in a speech before the board of directors and other members, that Mrs. Anderson wished the people to accept the gift as merely an act of hospitality extended by her to her neighbors, and not as mere charity, which, to say the least, was a very delicate method of conveying so rich a gift, and indicative of a beautiful spirit of philanthropy. These baths are the largest and finest equipped of any in the country, and while there are a number of similar baths in New York, none have the same capacity or luxurious appointments. The city government has done much to facilitate the good work, all taxes have been remitted, and the bath officials are paid by the city.

In speaking of the good accomplished by these public bath-houses, Mr. William H. Allen, general agent for the association mentioned above, says, that while there are now eighteen of these free baths in Greater New York, that they are yet inadequate for the needs of the "great unwashed" of the city, and that there should be at least thirty such places. Mr. Allen further says that the popular demand for free bathing is on the increase, and that if baths were built in sufficient numbers, so that people could reach them without traveling too far, that the number of bathers would be greatly increased. As it is, during the warm weather the capacity of the baths are taxed to the utmost. In a recent article on Fresh Air Work, Mr. Allen says: "We can never hope to restrict the summer temperature to eighty degrees and under, but we can look forward to a time when we can mitigate the distress due to summer heat, by providing Fresh Air Parks and Playgrounds, by securing better ventilation in homes, and by inculcating better standards of living, which will fight heat with cleanliness, fresh air and nourishing food."

That "Cleanliness is next to godliness," is an old saying, and during the long summer there will be no excuse for those who wish to be clean remaining unwashed, as the "Milbank Memorial," and all the other public baths in New York, will be open the year around. The tinkle of the spray on the marble will be heard, as the sparkling water, free to all, falls in reviving showers at the free public baths.

body, but they are appreciated by the tenement-dwellers in the vicinity. To realize what a boon the baths are, one only has to look that in the district east of Second Avenue, and between Twenty-third and Fifty-fifth Streets, there are over 50,000 people, living in 120 houses without bathing facilities. The ordinary tenement dwelling has no space to spare for the luxury of a bath-room or tub.

The exterior of the "People's Baths" is remarkably simple in appearance, plain and unadorned, being built of light-colored terracotta brick, with trimmings of white glazed terra-cotta, and the roof and cornice of copper and iron; these materials all big hard, and of a permanent character, they will absorb neither dirt nor water, but will be washed clean by every rain. The interior is amazingly clean, and being composed al-fly, and go up and up." God teaches us how to fly, bushing us off into the great abyss of trouble. He teaches us by the infinite power of the Atoning Cross. He then teaches us how to go up, and up, and up, by the object lessons of Christ's earthly life.

Have you and I ever stopped to fully consider how Christ's earthly life was meant to be an object lesson for sinful men, as the flapping wings of the old eagles are meant to be visible object lessons to teach the young eagles how to fly? God did not tell us how to brood merely in the abstract; but he tells us to be good as Jesus Christ was good, because Christ was born of our bone and flesh of our flesh, and suffered as we suffer, and was tempted as we are tempted. Thus, Christ's life is an object lesson to us in all our trials. We must do as he would do if he were in our place.

He knows the bitter, weary way,
The endless strivings day by day,
The souls that weep, the souls that pray,
He knows. He knows.

But there is still another lesson to be learned from the old eagle stirring up her nest. She pushes out her young, in order to make room for the next batch of fledglings. If she did not do this, there would be only one brood hatched in the nest. Thus the eagle's offspring, would only consist of two, or three, or four young. But no sooner does the old eagle finish raising one family, then she prepares to raise another batch of fledglings.

Have you ever considered how soon this old earth would be overcrowded and an unfit place in which to live, if God did not push the generations on and up. This is an age of the slaughter of the innocents. Life is a mortal combat for life. The earth is soaked with blood. The guillotine never stops its endless chopping. Every lullaby has a corresponding death-rattle. Every cradle implies a grave. So rapidly can shell life propagate, that one tiny cell can reproduce itself one thousand million times in a month. A common codfish lays between eight and nine million eggs every year. A common queen ant lays eighty thousand eggs in a day.

Herbert Spencer declared that if the cattle propagated themselves as rapidly as the insectile world, the cattle would die of starvation in a week. But though the human race does not reproduce itself as rapidly as the insectile world, or even as the cattle, yet if allowed to live on this earth uninterruptedly, it would soon be impossible for the growing members of the human family to exist.

New generations come, and room must be made for them. The infant leaves the cradle to a successor, and becomes the youth; the youth passes on to manhood, and on to old age, and the younger generations tread upon his heels at every step. At last he passes on into eternity. What then? The Apostle says, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but we know enough of that life to be full of hope. To those who through Christ have made peace with God, there is the promise of continued development. "They that wait on the Lord," says the prophet, "shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint." In that heavenly state there shall be neither hunger, nor pain, nor weariness, nor sickness, nor death. Even the eagle, long-lived as it is, grows old and dies, but there we shall live forever. And the love of our Father in heaven is eternal. The eagle's affections are transferred from one brood to the next, but nothing can separate us from the love of God, whose heart is large enough for all his children.

Would you have such a future to anticipate? Then let that power which God promises to impart, come even now into your life. The only thing that can blot out that prospect is sin. Dread sin as you would dread the bite of a serpent. Theodore L. Cuyler, the grand old man of the Brooklyn pulpit, graphically describes a scene which I have carried in my memory for many years. A peasant, living upon the mountain side, was on his way home in the evening hour. Tired after a hard day's work, he turned to look down the valley, which was a panorama stretched away at his feet. Suddenly, he saw a mighty-winged eagle begin to lift itself from a distant cliff. Higher and higher it rose, gorgeous amid the fires of the setting sun. Suddenly its movements became labored. It struggled and fought in mid air, and seemed to be gasping for breath. First one wing became helpless, then the second wing. Then the huge bird, like a stone, shot through the air and fell dead almost at the peasant's feet. The peasant could not understand the cause, until he went to the side of the bird and picked up the still warm corpse. Then to his horror, there wriggled from between his fingers a tiny serpent that had fastened itself under the bird's wing and sucked the life out of the "monarch of the air." So sin, as a venomous, clinging serpent, tries to fasten itself upon us. The mightier winged we are, the more anxious that satanic serpent is for our life's blood. But God will to-day not only save us, as the mother eagle does its young, but he does more. Christ has given us his life, in order to overcome the power of the serpent. He has died, in order that we might live. In this text of an eagle stirring up the nest of her young, cannot you feel the touch of a saving Christ?

I would send this Gospel message everywhere. The Episcopalian rector reads the Scriptures on the Sabbath day, upon a lectern made up of the outstretched wings of an eagle. Some writers declare that these eagle's wings symbolize St. John's inspired vision, which beheld the heavenly glories, as the eagle's eye looks into the light of the dazzling sun. Others assert that those eagles symbolize the flight of the Gospel message over the world. The last interpretation to me is the most beautiful. May this sermon not only have in it the message of God's love, but may it have the speed which every Gospel message should have—the speed like the lightning, which can bring to every sinful heart not only salvation but emancipation from sin. May God bless us to-day as we use the eagle's eyrie for a pulpit.

And as on eagle's wings we soar,
To see the face of Christ once more,
May heaven come down our souls to meet,
And glory crown the mercy-seat.

How We Helped Stricken Kwangs.

THROUGH the courtesy of the State Department in Washington, we have received a most interesting report from U. S. Consul-General McWade, at Canton, China, giving a general statement of the famine relief work in Kwangsi Province. It will be remembered that the readers of this journal contributed a fund for this benevolent work, which was most wisely expended under the direction of Consul-General McWade, assisted by the American and British missionaries in the Province, and also by leading merchants. Consul-General McWade's report is addressed to "The Subscribers of the Kwangsi Famine American Relief Fund." He writes:

The assistance received locally was rather small compared with the contribution received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, which amounted to $25,000 gold, besides other small individual contributions received from the United States, etc. Besides the 13,800 piculs of rice sent to the famine-stricken districts in three different expeditions, 200 sacks of American flour, the gift of C. E. Richardson, was also included in the second expedition. The boat hire for the third expedition is not included in the account now presented, because it was paid by His Excellency, Tsen, Viceroy of the two Kwangs, by whose order the boats were detained in Kwangsi for over a month, and who personally assured me that he would defray the transportation expenses.

The accounts have been very courteously audited by Rev. Robert E. Chambers, American Southern Baptist Convention Mission, Rev. Andrew Beattie, Ph.D., American Presbyterian Mission, and Major William Dana Shelby, M.D. After paying all accounts presented, there remains a balance in my hands of $4,941.01, which will be expended in case of a recurrence of famine in Kwangsi this year. If there is no famine, I suggest that this balance should be donated to the Rev. Andrew Beattie, Ph.D., American Presbyterian Mission, for the distressed lepers of Canton and its vicinity, who amount to over 20,000.

I am grateful to the American and British missionaries, male and female, who generously took charge of the distribution of the rice in the stricken districts, and who, in their characteristic self-sacrificing way, endured without complaint many hardships and inconveniences whilst succoring the needy. In my despatches to the Hon. the Secretary of State, I have named them all, personally and appreciatively.

Canton, China, April 12, 1904.

The Consul-General also makes special acknowledgment of valuable assistance received from the Hon. Gershom Stewart, of Hong Kong, Lieutenant E. A. Anderson, Commander, and Midshipman Frank W. Sterling, Executive Officer of the U. S. S. Callao, which convoyed the relief expeditions from Canton to the ports for distributing relief on the West River, Mr. A. M. Place da Silva, Chief Clerk of this Consulate General, who volunteered to keep all the accounts gratuitously, and make all disbursements of money. He adds:

Words of praise and thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, for its munificent charity, and to the individual contributors to the relief fund, fail to convey my profound appreciation of their humanity. Truly, in their abounding charity, they and the missionaries, and all other participants in the relief work, recognized the fact that true charity knows no nationality, no race. They fed the starving.

In conclusion, I have the honor to add that this report would have been completed and presented almost immediately after the end of the famine, but had to be deferred until His Excellency Viceroy Tsen, had made a final settlement of the accounts of the boatmen and junk owners. This was done on Saturday, March 26, 1904, when I received check therefor from the Sin How Co. That check was immediately paid over to Mr. Chan, of Poh Cheung, an American native Bank in Canton, through which all of the arrangements for purchase of the relief rice, chartering the junks, etc., were made, and carried to a successful completion.

To Hon. Francis B. Loomis, Assistant Secretary of State, Consul-General McWade writes: "You will note that the Relief Fund and its accounts, vouchers, etc., have been audited and found correct by a Committee consisting of Rev. Robert E. Chambers, American Southern Baptist Convention Mission; Rev. Dr. Andrew Beattie, American Presbyterian Mission; Major W. D. Shelby, M. D., Surgeon American Canton-Hankow R. R."

"The balance, after paying all expenses, amounts to Mex. $4,941.01. I am desirous of turning over this balance to the Rev. Dr. Andrew Beattie, American Presbyterian Mission, for the purpose of alleviating the distress and misery of the thousands of unfortunate lepers in Canton and its immediate vicinity. Almost all of these afflicted natives are in a state of starvation, and it would be a charity indeed to turn over this balance for their relief. The Rev. Dr. Beattie, a warm personal friend of mine, has for a number of years been ministering to them. No matter how loathsome may be their appearance, he cheerfully looks after their physical and religious wants. Of our self-sacrificing missionaries he is assuredly the best type. I feel convinced that the use of this balance in his hands would be beneficial in every way, and that it would be judiciously expended among the stricken people. Will you kindly place this statement before THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, through whose munificent charity the Relief Fund was largely organized and through which many thousands of human lives were saved."

ONE OF THE RELIEF STATIONS

Preaching and teaching were conducted at the station and at the kraals—the native homes. Day school was opened, and twelve pupils were accepted, though fifty men, women and children were present on the first day. Seven months after opening the school there were five young men and boys who could read intelligently and fluently in the New Testament in Zulu, though at the opening of school they had not an intelligent idea of what a book was for. Having heard the Gospel often in school and on Sundays during this period, some of them had "turned to the Lord," and were now going among their own people and tribesmen, reading and explaining to them the Word of God. Thus the missionary soon had helpers in his spiritual work, and also in his school. As soon as a pupil learned the vowels, he was considered sufficiently educated to teach another who did not know the vowels. Nothing was given gratis, excepting the Gospel, and as a result they appreciated the opportunities presented, and responded after a fashion most encouraging to the missionary. The use of civilized clothing was discouraged among them, rather than encouraged, but they would get them and wear them.

For two years the young worker continued alone in this new Gospel field. Though nigh to death from sickness on several occasions, his many duties, and the cares devolving upon him, made the time seem brief. The mission finally sent to him a companion, a Mr. Lindfield, to take charge of the itinerating work in Tongaland. He remained six months, and then left for Durban by ox-cart, intending to marry and return to Tongaland. But while on the outward journey, in crossing a lake, he was attacked by a crocodile, and so horribly mutilated that he died the next day.

Again Waters was alone. He telegraphed to his old traveling companion, Mr. Hedden, who was then in Capetown, inviting him to join him. Three months later he came.

Meantime, the Church of Christ in Tongaland continued growing in numbers and grace. "As the responsibility of evangelizing their tribe has been urged and placed upon the disciples, without financial help from the white man," Mr. Waters writes, "they are responding to their duty and privilege; and it is expected that soon one or more members of the First Church in Tongaland will go forth as teachers and evangelists among their own tribesmen in other parts of the country, supported by their own Christian brethren. My engagement of nine months was prolonged into nearly four years. I was a physical wreck when, at last, my successors arrived. They are Mr. Geo. F. Gale, an experienced and able missionary, who took up the work of the Gospel, and Dr. L. E. Hertslet, who is district surgeon, and helps in the station Gospel work. We bade farewell to the people, whom we had learned to love, and started for home. Mr. Hedden left with me. To reach the railway, two hundred miles distant, we traveled through both British and Portuguese Tongaland, over the Lubomba Mountains, through Swaziland, and into the Transvaal, and for the first time in four years saw a village and railway train. The journey occupied twenty-six days, five of which I was confined to bed in Swaziland. We traveled with donkeys and mules. Mr. Hedden remained in Carolina, Transvaal, to preach the Gospel. Pretoria, Johannesburg, and Capetown were visited again, and then I sailed for England, where, in London, I went into hospital for treatment, which proved very successful. And after six years' absence, and half a year on the return journey, I arrived home. I purpose returning to South Africa as soon as my book is published, and the Lord opens the way."

VISITORS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR

AND still they come, thousands and thousands, from every State in the Union, and from every country under the sun. They all find much that is interesting, and few are so traveled that they cannot confess to astonishment as well as pleasure at this magnificent array of all the wonders of the world. At the least interesting feature of the great Exposition is the crowd itself. Representatives of all nationalities and religions are to be met, all blending in a kaleidoscopic effect, as they move backward and forward along the walks and avenues.

The Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee, of New York, report that their efforts have been very successful in warning young women who are to visit the fair at St. Louis.

Leaflets and circulars have been sent out broadcast, and through the good offices of churches and kindred associations, have reached the class for whom the warnings were designed.

Directions, plain and full, have been given to young women going alone and unprotected to St. Louis, and every precaution possible has been taken that when a young woman reaches that city, she may not fall into the hands of unscrupulous persons who would lead her into harm.

Agents of the Travelers' Aid Committee are at the station from early morning until late at night, watching the arrival of all trains.

Ten thousand cards of warning have been posted in railway stations and other public places, and the report comes from St. Louis that the young girls now come in groups of two, three, and more, and nearly all of them are chaperoned, comparatively few traveling alone, and these are carefully looked after on arrival. The Committee have secured rooms and board for friendless girls who may become stranded, and will see that they are cared for until friends can be heard from.

All this work, of course, means the expenditure of money, and as the effort must be kept up until the close of the Fair, and as the Committee depends entirely upon voluntary contributions, it would seem to be the duty of all who are interested in the welfare of our young girls, and who can do so, to contribute toward so noble a cause. Contributions may be sent to Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee.

BISHOP I. B. SCOTT

Bishops for Mission Fields

VERY impressive were the services at Los Angeles on May 26, when the eleven Bishops elected by the Methodist Episcopal General Conference were consecrated. Portraits of the four new Missionary Bishops we are enabled to publish by the courtesy of the Christian Advocate. Bishop Isaiah B. Scott has served for some time as the Editor of the South- needs. The ability he has displayed as the editor of the India Witness, and in all the offices he has filled, marked him out for this new office, in which he is sure to do valuable service.

Bishop Oldham also is a missionary of wide repute in his chosen field. He was one of the delegates to the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in 1900, in New York. The breadth and clearness of his utterances at that Conference impressed all his hearers. His subject was, "How to present the Gospel to non-Christians so as to persuade and win." Missionaries not only from India but from other fields listened intently to his suggestions on the best methods of working among the heathen. As the adviser and guide of young missionaries, he is singularly adapted to his duties, and will without doubt aid materially in promoting the efficiency of Methodist missions in India.

There was some question as to the wisdom of appointing a Bishop for Japan and Korea, but none as to the man to be appointed if one was chosen.

Dr. Merriman C. Harris has fully proved his capacity for the difficult duties that are committed to his charge. It was held by some of the speakers at the Conference that the election of a Bishop might retard the movement toward the union of Methodist churches in Japan; but the feeling in the Conference was that it would tend to give the movement a wise direction, and would have no injurious influence. In any case a Bishop was needed in Korea, and was desired by the Methodist missionaries there, so that, if not permanently needed in Japan, his services would be acceptable in the other part of his field.

Dr. Harris was for several years a missionary in Japan, and since that time has been superintendent of Methodist Episcopal Missions among the Japanese on the Pacific Coast and in the Hawaiian Islands. His familiarity with the language and with Japanese character render his election eminently appropriate, and most hopeful for the success of mission work in Japan and Korea.

Western Christian Advocate. His work in that capacity and in the Conference encourage the highest hopes of his usefulness in his new office. There is naturally some concern lest the election of Dr. Scott for Africa might in any degree affect the work at Bishop Hartzell is conducting there. Dr. Buckley, however, explained that the Committee on Episcopacy had thoroughly considered that question before recommending the election of another Bishop for Africa.

The need for two Missionary Bishops for Southern Asia was due to the loss of Bishop Parker by death soon after his election, and to the fact that Bishop Hoburn has been laid aside by accident, which must incapacitate him for duty for some time, and, it is feared, may enfeeble him for some time to come. Dr. Robinson's election as one of these Bishops was a foregone conclusion. No man in the Methodist ministry better knows the condition of India and its

Should Old Saints Be Laid Aside?

ONE of the most significant acts of the recent Methodist General Conference was the retirement of six Bishops from active work. One—Bishop Merrill—was superannuated at his own request; the other five—Bishops—Andrews, Foss, Vincent, Mallalieu, and Walden—were retired, it is generally understood, without their desire or consent.

There has been a rising feeling through several General Conferences, that there should be a better understanding upon the part of the membership and the Bishops themselves as to the relation of the Episcopacy to the Church. It is the popular impression that the Episcopacy of the Methodist Church, like that of some other churches, is a higher order of the ministry, and that that order implies authority unchallenged and life-long. There is a feeling among many leaders that the public mind should be disabused on the subject, and that it should be understood that the Episcopacy of the Methodist Episcopal Church is not a higher order, only a higher office—that of General Superintendent—and that its duties and authority are determined by the people themselves in the action of their delegated Conference. The wholesale retirement of Bishops is construed by many to be a protest against the imperial power of the Episcopacy for life.

But the strongest reason for the laying aside of the five Bishops, doubtless was, that the delegates honestly believed them to be superannuated—to be so disabled by age as to be unfit for the strenuous duties expected of them. Whatever difference of opinion may exist elsewhere as to the wisdom of this action, there was evidently no difference of opinion upon the part of the Conference, whose vote in the Committee on Itinerancy, and in open Conference, was two-thirds for superannuation.

It was claimed that in justice to the work, the men of seventy or over should step aside and make room for younger ones. It was held that as the Bishops had compelled the involuntary superannuation of so many ministers in the Conferences, reminding them of the fact that the people did not want old men as pastors, and urging them to be "brave and resigned" under the disappointment, and to "sacrifice self for the good of the cause," it was nothing more than right for the Bishops themselves to endure some of the sacrifices they had felt it their duty to suggest to others.

Methodism will gain in certain directions by the retirement of her old Bishops, but she will lose in others. There will be a loss of elements not easy to define or handle, or put in the balances to weigh, but like gravity, light and heat, most potential elements in the Kingdom of God—character well rounded by years and comely with virtue; the maturity of faith, hope, love and service. Young men are needed to climb the mast and furl the sails in the storm; but the ship will go to wreck unless some man with a keen eye and level head stands at the helm and guides the vessel. Young men are needed to do the hard marching, to charge bayonets and scale ramparts, but not more than old leaders in Senates to furnish the sinews of war, or mature statesmen in Cabinets to direct the policy of the campaign. "The Kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force," and yet the most powerful weapon against moral evil in this world is the self-denial and cross-bearing of Christ's followers. The symbols of the progress of the church are not the blare of brazen horns, the beating of bass drums, the crash of chariot wheels, or the fluttering of flags in the wind; they are the seed growing into the yellow harvest, the leaven in the meal, the morning dawn driving away darkness and calling up all creatures into service and song. This is the kind of influence that would be lost to the church by a premature retirement of God's aged servants.

Competition is the law of trade. It is fierce at the present time in all the callings of life. It is a question, however, whether this law of competition should be allowed to exert itself so practically in crowding ministers, full of years and piety, out of the ranks, simply to make room for younger men. Christ plainly taught that competition is not the law of the Kingdom of God, but that unselfishness is. It would require a large economic gain to atone for the spiritual loss which the Church must suffer by unfair, unkind, or indifferent treatment of its aged ministers. Religion is not simply silver and gold, or church buildings, nor organized congregations, nor the survival of the fittest, nor mere cold-blooded practicality. It is sentiment, sympathy, love—a thing to be cherished. Reverence for age, regard for character, appreciation of long-suffering and service, love of spiritual excellences and respect for authority, are all a part of the religion of the Master. The old saint is the most precious human heritage the Church possesses.

The Value of Vacations

MR. RUSSELL SAGE recently expressed himself as not being in favor of vacations. They were unknown, as we understand them, in the days when he was young, early in the last century.

Mr. Sage is a very wise man as regards ways of accumulating vast amounts of money, and if that were the sum total of all human achievement, perhaps the average young man or woman would do well to sit at the feet of this Gamaliel of Finance. But it is the wiser man, with hundreds in his employ, be he merchant or manufacturer, who gives his employees a season of rest during the heat of summer. He will get better service, more willingly rendered, than were he to keep the workers at their posts with no time for recuperation.

But if the workers, those who toil either with brain or body, or both, need time for recuperation, what of the little children dwelling in the city's slums? Some in damp and foul-smelling basements, some under roofs upon which a fiery sun pours its cruel rays all day long, making the cell-like rooms on the top-floor tenements like ovens. What about these little ones who, pale and listless, get through the day somehow, and gasp away the nights, sleeping where they happen to fall in their weariness? What about these little ones, whom Jesus loved, and commended to our care, who never see a blade of grass, unless it is with a sign above to "Keep Off," who never saw an uncaged bird, or held in their tiny hands a flower all their own? There are hundreds, aye, thousands of such children in this city, and we do not believe that Mr. Sage could find it in his heart to say that they shall be denied a vacation, no matter what his views may be with respect to other classes.

It is for such children that Mont-Lawn stands open, ready to give ten days of healthful, happy living to all it can hold. Here, in the beautiful country, the children's eyes grow bright, the color comes to the pale cheek, and many a life is saved. Shall we not be true to our trust, and make this the "banner year" for the Children's Home? It costs so little, and means so much; only three dollars for each child. Twenty-one dollars endows a cot for the season, and means an outing of ten days each for seven children.

Trapped in the Old Way

THE extraordinary confession which was made by an aged millionaire in New York City last week, is a revelation of wickedness and folly which would be almost incredible if it had not been told by the infatuated man himself. According to his own story, he formed the acquaintance of a designing woman some eight years ago, when he was of the mature age of seventy-six years. He had been in business but had retired with a fortune of about a million dollars. His acquaintance with the fascinating woman continued in secret, he says, for some years, during which he lavished large sums of money upon her. By professing ardent affection for him, she cajoled from him larger sums every year, until he began to weary of the continued calls for money. Then her demeanor changed, and her coaxing turned to imperious demands, accompanied by threats of exposure. Hoping to avert the disgrace of a scandal, and the shame of his family, he yielded, until the total sum he had paid the woman amounted to nearly seven hundred thousand dollars. Still she was not satisfied. Then, feeling sure that she meant to strip him of his last dollar, he took a firm stand, refused to pay more, and has appealed to the law to aid him in recovering some of the money he has parted with.

The story is an old one, and differs from many others only in the advanced age of the victim and the extent of the amount obtained. From the days of Samson to the present, men have been befooled through the affections, and have lost character, property, and sometimes life itself, through the wiles of the temptress. It is not long since a statesman of world-wide fame, whose brilliant genius and consummate skill his country's hopes of independence were based, fell in a similar manner, lost the confidence of powerful friends, and was stripped of his own power to serve his country further. This, too, when the labor and suffering of lifetime seemed about to be crowned by success.

There is an old legend of the "Were-Wolf"—a relentless brute, which hovered around the home, and seized and devoured the most brilliant member of the family, but no wolf is so much to be dreaded as a woman who befools men, and makes them untrue to their better selves. Even the greatest and wisest of men, like David and Solomon, have fallen through the same temptation. "She hath cast down many wounded: yea many strong men have been slain by her." Is it too much to hope that this modern instance, proving the fact of the perpetuity of the peril, may serve as a warning to some who are in danger of falling? The rock on which so many gallant vessels have been wrecked, ought surely, at this late day, to be avoided by the mariner. But it can be done only by shunning the first approach to it. Once under the spell, the current is too strong to be stemmed. If at the beginning men would but realize the acute suffering, the burning shame, and the heartfelt misery that awaits them at the end, they might escape. Let none be deceived. There are many paths that lead to ruin, temporal and eternal, but in none of them is the prospect so alluring at the start, and so dark and stormy at the close. In none of them so surely as in this, does it prove true that, "the way of the transgressor is hard."

For Independence Day

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, the Magna Charta of the English-speaking race, has been removed forever from the people's reverential gaze. It has suffered very seriously from the rough treatment to which it was exposed in the earlier years of the Republic and has never been on exhibition at any of the great Fairs since the Centennial Exposition. It was returned to the State Department in Washington in 1877, and since then has never been out of the Department Building. For more than two years past it has not been on exhibition, even in the Department. Hereafter, in accordance with a report of a committee of the National Academy of Science, which was appointed to examine the document, it will be kept in the dark, and as dry as possible, and never placed on exhibition.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, deemed it fitting last year to place within the reach of its every reader a life-size facsimile of the Declaration, and with it the story of how and by whom it was written, and how given to the world. This book contains a complete history of the great document, biographies and portraits of the signers, and beautiful engravings of famous pictures which illustrate the preparation and adoption of the Declaration.

Last year we sold nearly 20,000 at 75 cents each, but now to close out the very small lot which we have on hand, we will, upon receipt of 25 cents, send immediately both the life-size facsimile of the Declaration, together with "The Story of the Declaration of Independence," and "The History of our Flag," fully prepaid—that is, 25 cents for the two. The stock on hand is very small, and the promptest action will be required to take advantage of this bargain. If the supply is exhausted when your order reaches us, we will refund your money at once. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD always refunds the money if the purchaser is not fully satisfied.

Held for Ransom

TRENUOUS efforts are being made by our Government, to obtain the release of Mr. Perdicaris, who, as stated in this journal last week, has, with stepson, Mr. Varley, been captured by the Moorish bandit chief, Raisuli, and held for ransom. Admiral Chadwick, on the cruiser Brooklyn, supported by the gunboats Marietta and Castine, has reached Tangier, and has notified the Sultan of Morocco of his having come to see that justice is done. The Sultan has opened negotiations with his religious subject, and is trying to obtain the release of the captives. He protests that time must be allowed for diplomatic work, as Raisuli threatens, if force is applied, to kill both men. The presence of our squadron at Tangier, has evidently served to quicken the Sultan's energies, but he declares that Raisuli's demands cannot be granted without imperiling the prestige of the Government. Raisuli requires the payment of $55,000 in cash, and also that America and England jointly pledge themselves to secure for him, from the Sultan, forgiveness of all his offenses, the withdrawal of Moorish troops from the district, and perpetual immunity from the payment of tribute or taxes to the Sultan of Morocco. Raisuli refuses to accept the Sultan's promise of these concessions unless the United States and Great Britain undertake that the Sultan keep his promise if it is given. It is difficult to see how the two powers could enter into such an undertaking, but the arrogant bandit declares he will not recede from his demands, and threatens to kill both his captives if the concessions are not promptly made. Appeals have been made by Mr. Hay to the French Government to use its good offices to effect the release of the two men, and it has cordially promised its aid. French representations are more likely than any others to be successful, as the Sultan is aware that France is seeking a pretext to annex his country, and Raisuli knows that his interests would suffer if the lax rule of the Sultan were exchanged for the supremacy of France. For the present there is a deadlock, which is full of peril to the two captives. They are doubtless in great anxiety. If a money ransom would satisfy the bandit they could easily raise it, but it is not in their power to comply with his other demands. Just so helpless was the whole human race when Christ came to its relief, and gave his life as a ransom for its redemption.

I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death (Hosea 13: 14).

Japanese Mistake

The interest taken in American life by the Japanese, led to a curious blunder due to the hasty conclusion of a transient visitor from that land. He has been writing for a Japanese journal his impressions of America, and among other things, he mentions seeing in New York a custom similar to that of Orientals. It was that of suspending outside certain houses brilliant illuminated cards, which he said were evidently prayer-cards. "They are," he said, "in one form and are not unornamental. They seem to be used by all classes, but are more common in the crowded districts. I have even seen them on store fronts. Sometimes they remain out only for a few hours; sometimes for days. There appears to be no rule regulating the time of display. Each of the prayers is a crimson square, with a singular, graceful, and rather complicated character, made up of curves, in the middle of the card. This character is of pure white. From what I could learn it has some deep religious and mystical significance. Its presence, however, has no restraining effect on those in its vicinity." An American in Tokio, who had read the article, at once recognized the illustration accompanying it as a reproduction of the card that householders hang out when they have refuse which they want the Street Cleaning Department to remove! Though the Japanese was wrong in supposing the card was a prayer, the householder who puts it out might be reminded by the act that there is much in life that might be removed through really earnest prayer to God.

As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us (Ps. 103: 12).

What a Man is Worth

A judge in Colorado has been called upon to decide how much a man is intrinsically worth, apart from his possessions. The man whose value was to be estimated was sixty-eight years of age. He had been killed on a certain railroad, and the company did not deny their liability for his death. The lower court thought he was worth four thousand dollars to his two sons, who made the claim, but the company appealed the case, on the ground that the estimate was excessive. In giving judgment in favor of the company, the justice called between Philadelphia and the Orient. He said that during one of his voyages he was sailing during a dark night at half speed, on account of the darkness and his unfamiliarity with the coast. Suddenly the man on the lookout forward heard a confusion of sounds resembling the humming of millions of bees. The headway of the vessel was at once checked, and then the noise resolved itself into the voices of birds. "In the succeeding moments of fear and doubt," says the captain, "the ship was allowed to drift, while we sought anxiously to pierce the intense gloom of the night. Then the anchor was dropped. When morning broke, an astonishing spectacle greeted us. Scarcely a quarter of a mile away was an immense towering rock, which, had the vessel struck it, would have dashed her to fragments in an instant. Stranger than all, the vast granite pile was habited by myriads of white birds, which reposed on its barren pinnacles and fluttered about the lonely apex. It was their warning cries, resounding through the night, which had saved the steamer." How thankful the captain must have been that he heeded the warning so strangely given! If men were as ready to heed the warnings of God's Word, how many might be saved from eternal destruction!

He that taketh warning shall deliver his soul (Ezekiel 33: 5).

Killed by Dust

A prominent medical journal in New York calls attention to the fact that street-sweepers furnish more consumptive patients than any other class in the city. Though they are examined by the city surgeon when they enter the service and pronounced sound, a large proportion develop tuberculous symptoms before they have been five years at the work. The journal believes that the disease is produced by their occupation. It says: "It is not the air, but the dust in the air, which renders New York such a dangerous place, particularly in summer, to people predisposed to pulmonary troubles. While, as a natural consequence of being in closer proximity to the dust, the street-cleaners are the first to suffer, the citizens at large who are obliged to remain in New York during the summer months suffer also to a considerable degree." Being surrounded by water on all sides, the air in

New York should be exceptionally pure, and it would appear from this medical authority that it is so; but it is spoiled by the earthy impurities that it absorbs. It is so with all kinds of evil. The good things that God provides for us are turned into evil by worldly associations. Only when we have his protection are we kept from moral infection.

I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil (John 17: 15).

BRIEF NOTES

The Carlisle Indian School is to be removed from Carlisle, Pa., to Helena, Mont. The land selected is on the north of the city, and comprises seven hundred acres.

Dr. John G. Paton, the Apostle of the New Hebrides, has just commenced, in spite of his eighty-one years, a long tour in Australia, to arouse interest in his mission field.

attention to the fact that the only basis for the claim of the sons, was, that they had been deprived of their shares of money that their father might have earned if he had not been killed. As at his age it was not likely that his savings, if he had lived, would have amounted to four thousand dollars, the verdict of the lower court could not be sustained. In other words, the value of a man must be estimated by his power to earn money. It is well for us that God has a different standard by which he estimates the value of a man.

I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee since thou wast precious in my sight (Isa. 43: 3).

Religious Work in a Southern Mill Town

BY MAY WILKINSON MOUNT

THE EPISCOPAL BOYS' CLUB

THE OLD-FASHIONED MILL WHEEL

THE GIRLS' FRIENDLY SOCIETY

IN the outskirts of the city of Columbia, S. C., lies a town made up of three villages, grouped about and named in honor of three cotton mills—Olympia, Granby and Richland. In this town, with its population of 5,000 souls—all mill operatives—are being solved two of the greatest problems of our country; the evolution of the negro into a useful citizen, and the true relations of capital and labor.

The Olympia mill represents $2,500,000 capital, and is the most expensively built mill in the South, and, it is said, in the country, as well as being the largest cotton mill in the world. Architects and mill owners have argued and laughed at the vast unnecessary expense of much of the work upon this building; but the man who spent the money for it, had a definite object in having the mill architecturally beautiful, with pressed brick and terra cotta and marble; with handsome towers with clock and bellry; with interior finish of marble and brass and Venetian tiling. He had the ceilings built eighteen feet high, and the walls filled with big windows; handsome lavatories were provided, and a passenger and freight elevator for the operatives. He claims that to so surround the working classes with things that are clean and pure and beautiful and comfortable, cannot fail to elevate them. That they are taught the value and pleasure of beautiful surroundings; the necessity and comfort of cleanliness; and their health is improved by having abundant air and light and space room.

The man who thought out the value of environment in the labor problem is the same who, after working harder than any of his operatives all the week, attends their Sunday afternoon services—both white and colored—to encourage them to go to church; and never fails to attend weddings with suitable gifts. He has taken a long step towards improving labor conditions.

After going through this mill, it appears no more than natural to wander into a large town with wide streets, set out with young trees, where the houses have from three to six commodious rooms, with piazzas back and front, and often around the side; where large grounds for gardens surround each home, and artesian water, of the purest quality, and electric lights are furnished the cottagers, with abundant hydrant water for washing purposes and for sprinkling the streets and lawns.

In the place are two superintendents; one to keep a constant supervision over the houses and see that they are kept in perfect repair and comfortable; the other to keep the yards and streets clean. Carts go through the town daily, removing every particle of refuse of every description, and sprinkling lime where regard for sanitation makes it advisable. Housekeeping is made easy to the mill women. Delivery wagons call at every house daily for orders and to deliver goods. A wood-yard is maintained by the mills, where cheap fuel may be had, and a large and handsome store is equipped with everything for use or wear. It is not obligatory upon any one to buy at these places, but most people do so, because they get cheaper and better goods than can be had in the next town. A free doctor; a large and beautiful park; two public schools, a kindergarten and three churches, are among the good things belonging to this model mill town. The Episcopal and Baptist churches are new and handsome red brick and stone edifices, and the land for all the churches, together with half the cost of the buildings, was given by the mill.

Rev. Wm. B. Sams and Deaconess Graham, of the Episcopal Church, have done good missionary work in Olympia. There are two Sunday services and one weekday service held in the church; two Sunday School services and regular services held in the Baptist Church by Rev. Vernon I'Anson, and in the Methodist Church by Rev. B. R. Turnipseed. Both these churches have larger congregations than the first named. The Episcopal Church has established a successful Friday reading room, a boys' reading club, a girls' society, and classes for children, an industrial class, and a mothers' meeting. Much local missionary work is done by the churches.

Those who minister to the spiritual needs of these mill operatives, say that they are "nice, quiet, gentle, genial, polite, hospitable people;" one even declaring that they "were the sweetest people to work among that she had ever met." They are unanimous in praise of the women as a "fine, a splendid set of devoted mothers." These people dress neatly, according to their means; have neat furniture in their homes, with sometimes a parlor organ, and have nice-looking beds, especially in their parlors, where some families have a well-decorated bed which they do not intend shall be slept upon, if it is possible to prevent such a desecration of its beauty.

Yet, with all this, there is a sad and pathetic element in this little Southern mill town. The people are polite and gentle, and never resent any intrusion, nor yet do they give much ground for believing that the visits of those interested in church work have made any deep spiritual or educational impression. Again, some of the families are hopelessly ignorant and many of them very poor. They are—many of them—in the clutches of the furniture instalment leeches, and are, with all the natural desire for neat things, ignorant of the right way to obtain these things. They have facilities for keeping chickens and cows, yet few of them do so.

Some parents force their children to work in the mills as soon as they are able to understand how to do a work at all; and there are fathers who drink and loaf and compel their wives and children to work at loom and spindle, to provide them with bread and a home. They are not noisy or disorderly, but simply lazy, and they are as a stone wall against the mental and physical improvement of their families. Then there are fathers who are sick, and whose families must work. It is surprising to find how many sick men there are among mill operatives. Many have worked hard and been poorly fed, and the close confinement of unaccustomed work in the mills has sapped what little vitality they had. These three classes of families fill a mill town with subjects for charity, and the church workers in Olympia have their hands full. Part of the work is teaching the women how to cook, an art in which so many are sadly ignorant. Children in the Olympia mill—children are not encouraged to work there—work half a day, and play or go to school half a day; but there are other mills where children work from six o'clock in the morning till seven at night, and amid very different conditions.

The simple religious work undertaken in this little community is far-reaching, if, perforce, slow in its effects, and the good already accomplished is without computation.

Banana Raising

It is interesting to know that a crop of bananas is harvested every fifteen days in Honduras. Each banana plant has many suckers or stalks growing from a single root at the same time. One or more bunches of the ripening fruit is cut from a single stalk, while the other stalks grow from the same roots are left untouched, and in fifteen days another of the stalks is shorn of its fruit. This process continues without cessation throughout the year. In July and August the ripening bunches are cut off every ten days, only once a month in December and January.

SOME OF THE DWELLERS IN THE MILL TOWN

THE NOON HOUR AT THE MILLS

Twin Tunnels Under the Hudson

TWENTY-FIVE years ago such a feat of engineering as that required in completing the tunnel under the North river would have been an impossibility, at least so it is said by men well versed in the knowledge of such work. To-day the tunnel is almost complete, and the work is done, as was making the long passage which connects the two cities, New York and Jersey City, is concerned.

Some fifteen years ago, an English company contracted to build this tunnel, and succeeded in making an excavation until a point was reached where the river broke through the bed, flooded the tunnel, and drowned a number of workmen. When the present company, of which Mr. Charles M. Jacobs is the head engineer, took charge, the flooded tunnel was pumped out. This done, all the wonderful aids to a work of this kind, which are the result of applied modern science, were brought into requisition. Starting from point in either city, so accurate were the engineer's calculations, that in time the two ends of the tunnel squarely met and were joined together. The processes by which this stupendous work was completed are intensely interesting.

A WONDERFUL FEAT OF MODERN ENGINEERING

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE OF THIS ISSUE

Operations have been carried on not only under the river, but under the river's bed, which, unlike its watery level surface, is very uneven, and jagged in outline, and as a great deal of the substance was solid rock, and a mixture of clay and stone almost as solid, the undertaking was one of much difficulty. In bridge-building, where the foundations must be laid away under water, caissons are used, under which the men work in excavating. These caissons are like an inverted dish, and are held down by great weights and pressure, the men being supplied with air from shafts, down which the breath of life is forced by engines upon the surface. The earth and rock dislodged by the men is shoveled under other shafts, where the suction from above is so great that it is all carried to the surface. But in excavating for the tunnel under the river, the work had to follow horizontal lines, necessitating a caisson which worked on the same principle as that used in bridge and in others, the solid rock makes this work unnecessary.

Sometimes difficulty is encountered, where the bed of the river sinks almost to the level of the tunnel. At one time, it looked as if the experience of many years ago was to be repeated; but when the water began to percolate through, the men sprang through the man-holes, locking the doors, and thus their lives were saved. These locks occur at frequent intervals throughout the length of the tunnel, and make the work much less dangerous, as each section can be closed independently. The leak from above was stopped by dumping scow-load after scow-load of clay and stone in the river, and filling up the depression in the bed. Then the flooded compartment in the tunnel was pumped out and work resumed.

The caisson is kept in its place and pushed along by compressed air as the excavating allows. There never will be danger of anything from the outside penetrating the steel lining of the twin tubes, the engineers say, or of anything from the inside getting out, except by way of the entrances at either end, for this heavy steel lining has tremendous resisting power.

In his office on the surface of the ground, and directing the movements of his workmen behind the caisson, who are delving into the bowels of the earth below, sits the man whose brain directs the great engineering work in every detail. The air pressure, and all the mechanical arrangements, are regulated by telephone calls between the office and the workmen. But who are these men behind the caisson? Not mere diggers and delvers, such as may be seen by the thousand, toiling in the city streets, grubbing and ditching. These men in the tunnel are skilled mechanics, trained workers, inured to hardships such as those who have never worked under or behind a caisson little dream of. They must not only understand their business, but they must know when to quit, for even their strong and vigorous bodies would succumb to the dreaded "caisson disease," which is the inevitable result of too long a stay in the compressed air, in which the work of excavating must be done. Four hours is the limit of a day's work. There have been no accidents since the tunneling has been under its present management. The electric lights in the tunnel are sufficiently powerful to turn the darkness of the interior into daylight. The tunnel will be completed and opened to the public in about one year, when from one hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand passengers can be transported daily between the two cities.

The tunnel is about one mile in length, and will cost about $6,000,000. It will be equipped with the latest improved electric cars, running at frequent intervals through the twin tubes, and the moving throngs who daily journey between New York and New Jersey will find ample and safe transportation.

The Progress of the War in the Far East

The Battle of Kinchow and Nanshan Hill--Fighting Near Liao-Yang--Kouropatkin's Plans--The Siege of Port Arthur

FROM eye-witnesses who saw the operations of the contending armies at the battle of Kinchow Neck, a reliable account of the most sanguinary engagement of the war has now been received.

On May 26, over 40,000 Japanese troops were massed on a spur of Mount Sampson, near the sea, slightly under cover of two nearby peaks, and within a mile and a quarter of the outer Russian entrenchments. The Japanese advance began at night, during a thunderstorm. After a severe fight, Kinchow Castle was captured, and then a heavy fog set in, preventing the use of artillery. Early next morning, the entire artillery force and the gunboats in Kinchow Bay shelled the Russian positions on Nanshan Hill. At nine o'clock the Russian fire had fallen off a great deal, and the Japanese infantry began to make short charges against the enemy. For hours the most desperate fighting continued, the Japanese charges being repulsed one after another until the hillside looked like a shambles. In one of the charges every man in the Japanese advance was either killed or wounded.

Russian gunboats, under cover of a fortified island of Liushutong, began shelling the Japanese left. The Russians landed troops in five launches, but they were driven back to their boats. Four nine centimetre guns on Nanshan Hill, fired steadily on the Japanese left. The Japanese artillery returned the fire, but without apparent effect. The upper part of Nanshan Hill is very steep, and upon it the Russians had erected permanent fortifications, while the slopes were protected by mines and barbed wire entanglements. The Russians had seventy guns and many quick-firers. The Japanese artillery poured a heavy fire into the enemy; but the defence was very obstinate, and the Japanese were unable to penetrate the Russian lines, which were strengthened by two batteries on Nanshan Hill.

A stroke of fortune was the discovery and destruction by the Japanese of the electric wires leading to the mines at the eastern foot of Nanshan Hill. This prevented the Russians from exploding these mines when the Japanese infantry crossed the ground where they had been placed. It is possible that the fortunes of the day hinged upon these mines. If the Russians had been able to explode them at the right time the losses among the Japanese troops would have been tremendous, and it is possible also that the Russians would have been able to hold the hill.

The Japanese were now running short of shells, and the infantry was compelled to make fierce charges, regardless of the losses they sustained. The first division charged bravely, but was checked by a fierce fire. It was in a tight place, when a gunboat in Kinchow Bay opened fire on the Russian left, and the Fourth artillery joining in the fire, they silenced the Russians. Then the fourth division charged the Russian left flank, and reached the first line of defence on the heights. The other division joined in the advance, charging over heaps of dead, and pierced the Russian lines, fiercely bayoneting the enemy, who fled, leaving the hill in possession of the Japanese. The Russians retreated to the south in disorder. They blew up their magazines at Tafangshang. The Japanese troops were in the highest spirits, and repeatedly shouted "Banzai" in celebration of their victory. The Russians lost one of their division of field artillery, two batteries, and a great number of other guns.

Gen. Oku reported the Japanese losses at 713 officers and men killed, and 3,469 wounded. Gen. Stoessel placed the Russian losses at 30 officers and 700 men killed. On the Russian side 12,000 troops were engaged in the defense against fully 40,000 Japanese.

After the engagement at Kinchow and Nanshan Hill the Japanese occupied Dalny, unopposed. Very little material damage had been done to the docks or buildings by the Russians, but there had been much looting by Chinese bandits.

Gen. Oku now began his preparations for the siege of Port Arthur. Reinforcements arrived in large numbers from Japan, 50,000 landing at Takushan, the greater part being added to Gen. Oku's force investing Port Arthur; while detachments landing at other points advanced northward to reinforce Kuroki.

Previous to the battle of Kinchow Neck, Gen. Kouropatkin, it was reported, had been urged by the St. Petersburg authorities to make a strong effort for the relief of Port Arthur. He accordingly sent a force of 30,000 troops, under Gen. Stalkenberg, including several thousand Cossacks, southward, intending to make a dash through the Japanese lines, but the fall of Kinchow and the continuous arrival of fresh Japanese troops caused the abandonment of the Russian general's daring project. Kuroki now had a strong military line across the peninsula, and his force was being daily augmented. Gen. Oku's troops had destroyed all railroad and other communications for a considerable distance north of Port Arthur, making a dash by a relief force impracticable.

It was estimated that on June 3 there were not less than 200,000 Japanese troops in Manchuria, but as Russian reinforcements were regularly arriving at Harbin at the rate of 2,000 daily, it was expected that Gen. Kouropatkin would soon have an army of sufficient strength to assume the offensive. As rapidly as they arrived, the Russians were sent to Liao-Yang.

Meanwhile, severe fighting between the outposts was of almost daily occurrence, with varying results, though chiefly favorable to the Japanese, owing to their superior numbers. There was also considerable Cossack raiding reported in Korea.

Immediate interest now centres on the fate of Port Arthur, where Gen. Stoessel has probably 30,000 men available to withstand a Japanese assault. Gen. Oku will have a force of fully 100,000 troops for this tremendous undertaking, the failure of which is still confidently predicted by Russian military leaders.

In a dispatch from Rome dated June 3, it was stated that the Japanese had occupied the outer line of the defences of Port Arthur "after a feeble resistance," and that four divisions of Japanese had taken up a position on Kwang-Tung heights, on which they had placed heavy artillery, entirely dominating the town.

Food and fuel are both reported to be short at Port Arthur, and the garrison is said to be on half-rations five days in the week. The channel, according to the latest Russian reports, is again clear, and when the critical moment arrives, the fleet will make a dash for liberty, as did the Spanish fleet under Admiral Cervera at Santiago. They will attack Togo's cordon of warships and try to break through, and should they fail, the last of the squadron will go down with flags flying, rather than surrender.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

THORWALDSEN'S STATUE OF CHRIST

AS we look at the star, let us together repeat the verse: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship him." Who sang a song in the skies when Jesus was born? Where did the shepherds find him? "Wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger." When Jesus was forty days old, why did Mary and Joseph take him to the temple? "To present him to the Lord." What did the drive away? The darkness of night. Because Jesus drives away the darkness of sin out of wicked hearts, what name is given to him? "The Sun of Righteousness." What did the girl who danced ask of Herod? "Give me by and by, in a charger, the head of John the Baptist. Let us count the loaves in the picture at foot of page. How many people did Jesus feed with only so many loaves and fishes? "Five thousand men besides women and children." What kind of bread did Jesus offer to those same people on the next day? Jesus said unto them, "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall not hunger," (see "bread" in heart). Whose son is Jesus? "He is the Son of God." Why did God say: "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him?" "Because Jesus is our King, and we must obey him" (see crown). Why does God give his angels charge over little children? "Because it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish."

Who is your neighbor? Everybody who needs our help. What did Jesus say about loving our neighbor? "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Because Jesus gives the light of love to all our hearts, what is said of him? He is "the Light of the World." Because Jesus has the key that unlocks death, what did he say to Lazarus when he had been dead four days? "Lazarus, come forth." See the pile of money. When a rich young man came to Jesus and asked him how he could get into heaven, what did Jesus say? "Sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor." What kind of rich people cannot get into heaven? "Them that trust in riches." What will keep us from loving riches better than heaven? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." Who was it climbed up in a tree to see Jesus? "Zacchaeus, chief among the publicans." Why is Jesus called the friend of publicans and sinners? Because he "came to seek and to save that which was lost." When Jesus rode like a king into Jerusalem, what did the people do? "Many spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees and strewed them in the way, and they that followed cried out, saying, 'Blessed is the King that cometh in the name of the Lord.'" Jesus told his apostles the story of a man who had a vineyard. How did the men who rented the vineyard treat the master's servants? Very badly, "beating some and killing some" when the master sent to get his grapes. What did they do to the master's son when he was sent? "Killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard." Why were the people angry to whom Jesus told this story? "They knew he had spoken the parable against them." Jesus has said he will come back again to this world, can we tell by the clock when he will come again? "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." What does he want all his to do while they are waiting for him? "Take ye heed; watch and pray." Before Jesus went back to heaven, why did he tell his friends to eat the bread and drink the wine of the Lord's Supper? "This do in remembrance of me."

wise men from the East do when they had found him who was born King? "They fell down and worshiped him, and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts, gold, frankincense and myrrh." What did Joseph do when the angel came and told him that Herod would seek to destroy the little Jesus king? "He took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt." A picture of a Bible roll may be used to make us think of Jesus growing wise when he was a little boy. In what three ways did Jesus grow? "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." When Jesus had grown to be a man, to whom did he go to be baptized in the river Jordan? To John. When Jesus was baptized what did he see? "The Spirit of God descending like a dove and lighting upon him." Where did Jesus go after he was baptized? He was "led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." The words of what book were like a shield to him? The Bible. Let us look at the words, "five friends." How many of you can name five men who were the first disciples of Jesus? John, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Nathaniel. Let us look at the picture of the water-pots of stone. In what place did Jesus turn the water into wine? "This beginning of his miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee." When Jesus found men in God's house selling sheep, and oxen, and doves, and changing money, what did he do? "He made a scourge of small cords and drove them all out of the temple." Let us look at the water jar. What did Jesus ask of the woman of Samaria who came to the well to draw water? "Give me to drink." What kind of water did he say he could give her so that she would never thirst again? "Living water."

Water-Pots

Dove and Bible

In what town did Jesus first begin to preach? "He came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up." Were the people pleased with the preaching of Jesus? "They led him unto the brow of the hill whereupon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong." What did Jesus do? "But he, passing through the midst of them, went his way." When Jesus preached to the crowds of people on the seashore, what did he do? He sat down and taught the people out of a boat. Let us remember that Sabbath day in Capernaum when Jesus cured Peter's wife's mother. Did he cure any one else on that day? "All they that had any sickness with divers diseases brought them unto him. And he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them." To what man did Jesus say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," also, "Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thy house?" A man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed. (See "Forgive.") Who did Jesus say is king of the Sabbath? "The Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath." (See crown.) What did he say it is right for us to do on the Sabbath? "It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days."

Can we tell the apostles' names? "Peter and Andrew, James and John, Philip and Nathaniel, Matthew, Thomas and Simon Zelotes, and James the less, Jude and Judas." What are the words of the Golden Rule? "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Who gave this rule? How can we become sisters and brothers of the Lord Jesus? "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother." Who put John into prison? "Herod had laid hold on John and bound him and put him into prison." What is the "seed," which is planted in our hearts? "The seed is the Word of God."

What is the name of the sea where Jesus loved so much to be? Galilee. In what river was he baptized? The river Jordan. To what great city did he often go? Jerusalem. What kind of darkness does the sun in the sky to see Jesus? "Zacchaeus, chief among the publicans." Why is Jesus called the friend of publicans and sinners? Because he "came to seek and to save that which was lost." When Jesus rode like a king into Jerusalem, what did the people do? Jesus has said he will come back again to this world, can we tell by the clock when he will come again? "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." What does he want all his to do while they are waiting for him? "Take ye heed; watch and pray." Before Jesus went back to heaven, why did he tell his friends to eat the bread and drink the wine of the Lord's Supper? "This do in remembrance of me."

Illustration and Application

Centuries ago, workmen might have been seen dragging a great marble block into the city of Florence. It was long and heavy, and was intended to be made into a statue of a great prophet, but when Donatello, the sculptor, saw it, he refused to accept it, as it contained some flaws. So there it lay in the yard of the Cathedral in Florence, a useless block, despised and rejected. One day Michael Angelo was passing, and his eye caught sight of the block. There rose before his vision a thing of beauty. He would make a statue of it! He took a long time, and allowed no other hand to touch it. A friend said that he was only spending days and weeks of his time upon trifles. "Trifles make perfection," he replied. Two more years passed away, and at last the statue was finished. On the twenty-fifth of January, 1504, the great artists of that day assembled to see what Michael Angelo had made of the despised and rejected block. There were Monciatto, Cosimo Roselli, Botticelli, and San Gallo, and Leonardo da Vinci, Filippino Lippi, and Pietro Perugino. The marvelous work was unveiled. The artists' judgment was unanimous. It was a masterpiece. It must stand in the public square. So, there for centuries it stood, though they have since placed it within walls to protect it from decay. And to-day, if you will go to the Academia delle Belle Arti, you will see the very statue that was once a valueless block, the far-famed "David" of Michael Angelo. It represents the Shepherd King in the strength of his ruddy youth. The eyes are full of sweet perceptiveness, the right arm poised so as to hold the sling, the body agile and strong, a sculptured poem of strength. So the Son of David, Jesus of Nazareth, despised and rejected of men, has become the head of the corner, the Corner-stone of Christian civilization on earth, as he is the glory of heaven.

The pastor of Mount Vernon Church, Baltimore, recently preached a sermon that might be expanded into a full review of the life of Christ as one great panorama of unselfishness and self-sacrifice. The sneering remark of the high priest as he stands beside the cross, "He saved others, himself he cannot save," was the text. The bystanders overhear it, and a citizen of Jerusalem exclaims, "Indeed, he did 'save others,' for I saw one of my blind neighbors saved from life-long blindness. This very man on the cross put clay on his eyes and sent him to the pool of Siloam to wash, and ever since he has rejoiced in the light of day." A Gallilean says, "He has 'saved others,' many of them up our way; one, a palsied man, borne by four friends on his bed to this man, from whom he came back to his home bearing his own bed, and leaping with joy. A traveling man chimes in, 'I travel among the cities of Decapolis selling goods and I was nearly killed by a crazy demoniac but this Jesus came along and that crazy fellow is a new man, quiet and industrious, joy to his home.' A man of Bethany says, 'Greater than all your stories, this Jesus saved Lazarus of our town from death when he had been long buried.' But in contrast to all this it was indeed true, though in a deeper sense than the selfish high priest could understand, 'Himself he cannot save.' This is one of the can not of character. He could not save himself from the cross because if he did he would cease to 'save others.' 'Christ must needs have suffered,' that whosoever will may be saved."

cease to "save others." "Christ must needs have suffered," that whosoever will may be saved."

Mrs. F. R. Feudge relates that a little Chinese boy, Ah Fung, had been taught at one of the mission schools at Ningpo to read the Bible, and to go to Jesus in prayer whenever he was in need of help. When he was about nine years of age, his father took Ah Fung with him on one of his trading expeditions to the Korean capital. By some mishap, while there, the boy was stolen and sold to the governor, who presented him to his wife. She made him her page, and he would often attempt to tell his young mistress of the Saviour he loved and trusted, but without avail, until one day death took away her baby girl; and then, in her great loneliness and sorrow, she recalled the words of her little page about Jesus and his love, and asked him to tell her the story again. Day after day did this Christian child talk of the Saviour, until she, too, came to love this same Friend.

Childhood

I want to introduce you to a beautiful Roman maiden young, and of high birth, whose sublime heroism is a pattern for all Christians of all time. Her lovely face and charm of character attracted to her a host of admirers. Yet, though many wooed, no one won that proud heart. "Their words are fair," said she, "but words are so easily spoken. What of their deeds? Not one of them loves me well enough to die for me, or do a great and splendid action for my sake. I wait to give my heart's love to one who would love me even to death." "You will wait long for that," said her father with a sneer. But he was mistaken. She had not long to wait. Through a slave, who acted to her as lady's-maid, she heard the good news of the Saviour who died for us. "Do you say it was for love of us he died?" she asked again and again. "Indeed it was," answered her handmaiden. "Then I am pledged to be his said the beautiful girl. 'I vowed to give myself on to one who would die for love of me.' Her father insisted she should give up her new faith; but she answered, 'The Son of God loves me; he died for me; I cannot deny him.' 'Renounce his religion, you die; choose,' said her parent, decidedly. We are told which she chose. The love of Christ constrained her to follow her Lord, even unto death."

A young man who was offered a packet of infidel publications, declined to accept, saying: "If you have anything better than the parable of the Prodigal Son, and that of the Good Samaritan; or if you have any better code of morals than the Ten Commandments; or anything more consoling and beautiful than the Twenty-third Psalm; or anything that will throw more light on the future and reveal to me a Father more merciful and kind than the New Testament, send it along."

Someone said to a white-haired old man, over ninety years old, "Do you love Jesus?" His whole face lighted as he answered, "I know something better than that. He loved me! For sixty-seven years I've known him as my Saviour, and I've never tired of saying, 'The Lord love me.'" George MacDonald writes: "I do not feel one older than I did at three-and-twenty. Nay, to tell the truth I feel a good deal younger, for then I only felt that I had to take up his cross, whereas now, I feel that a man has to follow Him; and that makes an unspeakable difference."

The Ladies' Luncheon

A FAVORITE form of graceful hospitality is the ladies' luncheon. To this fete the hostess invites her friends, suggesting to the men of the house if they happen, as a rule, to come home to a mid-day dinner, that on this occasion they may kindly find entertainment somewhere else. Whatever the season, the luncheon served to women is composed of delicate and dainty viands, beautifully arranged, with the best linen, the best china and the richest silver the house affords. During spring and summer, flowers in variety may be utilized for the centre of the table. A bowl of roses, carnations, nasturtiums or sweet-peas, is always very decorative and beautiful. Use only one kind at a time. Of course the flowers selected depend on the month in the year, trailing arbutus for the spring, and lilies for August, golden rod for September, chrysanthemums for October and holly for Christmas. The chief necessity is to have something distinctive and attractive in the way of color for the middle of the table. About this time last year, a New York hostess gave a luncheon to her friends, in which the floral decorations were all in white and purple. A great mass of them in the centre of the round table made the room fragrant and was most restful to the eye. For wedding luncheon, white roses and lilies are very appropriate, and, so far as possible, everything on the table should be in white and silver. At such a luncheon, the company would be mixed, both men and women, and would sit around the room instead of the table. For a ladies' luncheon, the menu may perhaps be

One may vary her menu, and have simple or elaborate to suit herself; but everything should be good of its kind, and a hostess should never attempt anything when she has company that she has not previously tried in the bosom of her own family.

In order to have any festival pass pleasantly, one must choose guests who will be congenial. I have been at parties which were far from pleasant, because the guests were misfits. You cannot entertain all your friends at one time, and you should be at pains to invite those who know one another, who probably will have a good deal in common. The guest of honor is seated at the right of the hostess, the intimate friend of the family takes the seat opposite the hostess. Group the others in whatever way will probably be most agreeable to them. If you have place cards with the names of the guests upon them, they will easily find where they belong. Among the most delightful functions are the annual breakfasts and luncheons given by women's clubs, to which a bid is considered a compliment, and where the club's guests usually sit at a table on a raised platform, a step or two above the rest of the room, overlooking the round or square tables where the club members sit. These functions are usually followed by a programme of music and by witty after-luncheon speeches, in which many women in these days excel. The droll story, bright incident, and gay repartee are greatly prized when adorning a narrative at a ladies' luncheon.

The Family Sewing

Though most of us have regretted the long, cold spring, yet it has given the prudent housekeeper a fine opportunity to forge ahead with the family sewing. By this is not meant those tasks of the needle that are always to be expected, such as the weekly mending, and the making of slips for the baby, or a new frock for little Susy, but the regular campaign that confronts us every spring and autumn. There is now a chance to buy ready-made garments and un-

Commencement Days

JUNE, the month of weddings and of roses, is also the month of Commencements. Every summer a great company of young men and young women, carefully trained and nurtured in the finest learning their alma mater can give, go forth to undertake the world's work. They are graduated from schools of technology and of medicine and of law, from other institutions as well, and bright, eager, strong, they set forth with the gay courage of youth, to attack whatever lions may be in the path. The great commanders of the future are to-day in the government schools for army and navy, mere lads, but they will order the onward marches of civilization and direct the warfare of sea and land before many years. The great surgeons are stepping forth from their class-rooms now. In fact the biggest people of to-morrow are enrolled among the youthful people of to-day. We are forever passing on, and the high-water mark of no generation is reached until its sons are attaining their majority. Then they advance and the former generation retires.

There is nothing but joy in all this. It is as it ought to be. Ring, merry bells. Blow, silvery bugles. Beat, gallant drums. Wave, proud banners. For, all abloom with the glory of the morning years, blithe of heart and of foot, well-equipped for the fray, the lads are coming who shall sweep everything before them. "All the blue bonnets are over the border!" The young fellows who fling off cap and gown, and leave the cloistered calm of their colleges, spring alert and dominant over the world's border, ready to vanquish whatever enemy lifts a hostile spear.

And the girls, who at Commencement, so modestly, yet so fearlessly accept their well-earned diplomas, they are worthy of all honor. They will do wonderful deeds for humanity. But the most successful girl of the ten thousand girl-graduates will be the one to accept domestic life and duty, who marries the man she loves, and becomes a contented and honored wife and mother.

Not every girl will find her life comrade waiting for her. Some will be needed to teach others; some to nurse the sick; some to be physicians, missionaries, business women, journalists, to engage in useful work and serve the present age. Blessings on the girls who may be graduated, whatever they elect as the calling of their future.

Some of us, stout, prosperous, middle-aged, or elderly, go back to Commencement, that we may meet old friends and classmates, and witness the triumph of our sons and daughters. Not so long ago, that plump matron was herself a slim maiden in a white frock; that bald-headed gentleman, a rollicking youngster who had not even a bowing acquaintance with dignity. Forgetting that time has wrought changes in ourselves, some of us marvel that A. and B. have grown old. But old or young, we have jolly times at Commencement, and the blessing of June, rose-hued and fragrant, falls on our heads.

"I SPY!"

derclothing at tempting prices, and of this many avail themselves. Yet the conscientious woman does not buy, for principle's sake, those articles which are obviously sold at so low a rate that their makers must have received a starvation wage, and really elegant and beautiful raiment comes high. The home needlewoman can save money by doing the family sewing at home.

A method preferred by some judicious managers is to devote a month to this work of making or renovating, to engage a seamstress, if needful, or a dressmaker, and then, making a business of it, get the season's sewing out of the way. By this means the mother of six says she has time to spare for much reading and study, for church work, and for visiting. And when hot weather lays its enervating spell upon the land, and one ardently longs for repose, there is no burden of sewing that must be done, that unduly taxes the vital energy.

hold word in America, bears a similar testimony to the training his wife has bestowed upon the children of the home. "I never had time to spend on them," he said. "I have lived in the constant grind of production, and my unreal people have been with me more truly than those whom I have met and with whom I have mingled. Their mother it is who has made our children what they are."

An evangelist, whose rare spirituality and consecrated eloquence brought thousands into the kingdom, once said reverently, "There is a little woman in my home, whose voice has never been heard outside our doors, and she has been the mainstay of our household. One by one, she has impressed her own courage, faith and sincerity on the children as they have come under her care. She, not I, must have the credit for what our sons and daughters may amount to in the world."

Leading American Women Praise the "Iowa Idea"

THE following letters from a number of leading American women, were written in response to a request for an expression of opinion relative to the measure lately introduced in the Iowa Legislature, providing for the appointment of a State Director of Marriage and for instructions in and diplomas for Domestic Science.

A Department for "Making Good Husbands"
Very Desirable, Writes Kate Upson Clark

THE idea of a Director of Marriage for each State, and of instruction in Domestic Science in all our institutions for women, is excellent. It should especially be urged that a department for making good husbands should be established in each of our universities for men. Our leading lawyers agree that four-fifths of the divorces are caused by the desertion or disloyalty of husbands, and it is the determined and incorrigible bachelorhood of our men which necessitates the spinsterhood of so many women. No amount of preparation for marriage, nor of desire for marriage on the part of our young women, can promote their marriage. Young men are not looking for the best prepared wives, and especially they are not looking for those maidens who are most anxious to marry. No doubt they will shun those most conspicuously unfit, and those who aggressively oppose matrimony (unless they are very handsome); but a pink-and-white complexion, and a willowy figure, enkindle a man's affections far more ardently than any amount of knowledge, even of domestic science.

By all means, let us educate our girls in that department, for the information will not come amiss, wherever their lot may lie; but especially let us have Professors of Matrimony in our universities, to teach young men how to be good husbands, and to imbue them with a wholesome horror of bachelorhood. Works by Charles W. Eliot and Theodore Roosevelt will make good text-books, and doubtless those gentlemen, and many others, will assist in endowing the proper professorships.

KATE UPSON CLARK.

The "Iowa Plan" will Lessen the Divorce Evil, Writes Alice T. Bartram

MATRIMONY, as yet, is not an exact science, and there do not appear to be any well-regulated laws that govern it. I am somewhat in the dark concerning the exact curriculum that the "Iowa Idea" would advocate; but I am, however, heartily in favor of any sane and sensible project that will result in the lessening of the divorce evil. Scientific and accurate housekeeping is an important feature in domestic happiness. A well nourished, comfortable family, is apt to be a cheerful and contented one, and the cheerful, contented family is apt to have a well satisfied man at its head. I am of the opinion that poor cooking is responsible for much intemperance, and a shiftless and extravagant home has ruined many business enterprises. On the other hand, an early and improvident marriage has more serious results for a woman than for a man, and it would appear wise, if young men could be taught exactly how much it costs to establish and care for a home, before they undertake the responsibility of one. Domestic Science as taught in the public schools of France, has not solved the divorce problem for that country. Love has ever laughed at locksmiths, and I fear it may smile at legislators, but a diploma in Domestic Science, is, after all, the best forerunner of the marriage certificate that I know.

ALICE T. BARTRAM.

Restore the Old-time Exalted Ideal of Family Life, Writes Mrs. Darwin R. James

THE introduction into the Iowa House of Representatives, of a bill asking for the appointment of a State Director of Marriage, and for instructions in and diplomas for Domestic Science, is encouraging. One cannot without pain, read the opinions of leading Christian Statesmen, that "we are rapidly going on to the pass to which the Rome of Livy had come, and of which he said that the evils were so great, that they could neither be cured nor endured." The proportion of divorces to marriages is astonishing and sickening, not only in the newest States, but in the oldest Commonwealths—destruction of the family and lowering of the ideal of home, goes on unceasingly.

One hears and reads similar utterances, with nevertheless a clinging to the hope that the great heart of America still beats true to a high moral tone, and that she will return sooner or later to her old-time exalted ideals of family life and the sweet graces of the typical American Christian home. God grant that this may be the case, and that the Iowa idea may be a precursor to the return to better conceptions of the sacredness of marriage relations. To bring about this return, a more thorough Christian education in the home, may be well followed by such education in Domestic Science as must be possessed to make marriage a success.

How to manage on a certain income, so that money may be saved for sickness or casualties, and yet something laid aside for the future; how to prepare digestible appetizing food; some conception of house sanitation and drainage, and other practical knowledge, with careful instruction in the physical science of wedlock, would do much toward preventing friction and discord in the very close relations of married life.

Iowa's undertaking will be very closely watched by other States, and if successful, followed; and we wish her unbounded success.

MARY E. JAMES.

The State Cannot Regulate Marriage, Writes Mrs. Truman J. Backus

AT first idea, the Iowa plan seems attractive and plausible. Half the crimes and social anomalies which deform the news columns of our day would be preventable by a deliberate, honest acceptance of the marriage relation, with its normal consequences and reciprocal obligations. Among the dependent and criminal classes the regulation of marriage seems a crying need. Some penologists would prevent it altogether. We have the best authority for believing that a healthful, comfortable home, well managed in those practical details which depend upon the housemother's knowledge and skill, is likely to be a centre of morality and patriotism. This is especially true among the laboring classes; where good cooking and good ventilation prove the best antidotes to the drink evil. On the other hand, the student of sociology must view with alarm our rapidly growing tendency to substitute legislation for the trained sense of individual responsibility, which Dr. Von Holst accounts the foundation-stone of our Republic. We are putting more laws upon our statute books which are in themselves difficult of enforcement, and which repress personal initiative, without taking into account the hereditary tendencies of our complex and cosmopolitan populations. No "blue law" works successfully under democratic auspices. One cannot but fear that State effort to control and administer marriage would prove as painfully nugatory as the Maine liquor laws or the Sunday closing ordinance in Greater New York.

MRS. TRUMAN J. BACKUS.

Fit Our Women for Homemakers, and Our Men for Breadwinners, Writes Varina F. Cox

ALL our schools are for the purpose of fitting children and youth for their life work. What more important work can come to any than the establishing and proper maintaining of a family? The family is the national unit. The individual is only a fraction. If, then, the family be the national unit, the character of the families composing the nation will determine the character of the nation. If the families are corrupt and weak, the nation will be corrupt and weak. Every nation that has died, died of moral corruption. The increase of divorces in our country is an indication that something is wrong with the family. It behooves us to inquire into the cause of the trouble.

There is no doubt that a large proportion of young people enter the marriage relation with wrong ideas. Few women marry with the intention of being what God designs a wife to be, a helpmate. Every wife should be a homemaker. A mere housekeeper cannot be a homemaker; but a homemaker must be a housekeeper. If a man marries, expecting his wife to minister to his pleasure only; if he is not willing to bear any share of the burdens which must, of necessity, come; if the wife be ignorant of household duties and impatient of the restraints of the home life; if the care of the house and children be irksome to her, is it any wonder if such a marriage ends in a divorce?

In Paris there are nearly one-half as many divorces as marriages each year, and the death rate is in excess of the births. The fear of national extinction has led to the introduction into the national legislative body of bills for the increase of population. Families of certain sizes are to have their taxes remitted. As prevention is better than cure, why should not our country try to prevent such a state of affairs as exists in Paris, by requiring all schools that are supported wholly or in part by the State to have a course of study in Economics, which shall fit women to be homemakers and men to be breadwinners? There should be provision for courses of lectures which would give to both sexes a true knowledge of the duties and responsibilities incident to marriage. The State certainly should have such a supervision over marriage as to prevent persons physically, mentally, or morally unfit, from burdening the State with their imbecile offspring.

VARINA F. COX.

Teach Our Daughters the Dignity of Domestic Science, Writes Mrs. A. McD. Wilson

THE "Iowa Idea" has much to commend it in seeking to check the divorce evil, which is sapping the morality of American home life. As to the College of Matrimony, the plan itself seems worth the trying, but might not that name form an embarrassment, and possibly a point of attack from those whose pleasure it is to turn to jest and ridicule all that savors of reform?

The Bill before the Iowa House of Representatives, asking for the appointment of a State Director of Marriage, and for instruction in and diplomas for Domestic Science, is a step in the right direction, but only a step. Until laws shall be enacted prohibiting divorce, except for Biblical reason and parents realize their own responsibility to God and man, no amount of outside instruction or direction will qualify the children for higher moral responsibility than has been accorded them by precept and example in the home.

Teach our daughters from infancy the dignity of Domestic Science. Elevate Domestic Science to an art, and accord it the same appreciation and respect given those who lead in the fine arts. Make Domestic Science as much a part of the school curriculum as the three R's. Let a woman feel that it is more honorable to be mistress of her kitchen range than to stand behind a counter, or fill a position in a business office, and far safer.

Woman's rightful place is in the home, and as homemaker she fills the highest position God has called her to fill, for to her is committed the subtle power to rule and sway by her charm, and in the home she is queen indeed with no one to dispute her sovereignty.

MRS. A. MCD. WILSON.

Educate Our Young People for Happy Marriage, Says Mrs. Margaret Bottome

THE "Iowa Idea" is a big one; but what else could you expect from the land of tall corn? Well, if education is needed in any direction, it is needed in the direction of educating young men and women for happy marriages. For woman to know even how to cook, has much to do with happy marriage. I can see myself now, as a young wife, sitting on a low stool by the side of an old stove, and opening the oven door every two minutes to be sure that that roast of beef was rare, because that was the way my husband liked it. I need not tell you that it was cooked to death.

That "Iowa Idea"

Threw a narrow floodgate back
That let in memory's tide.

A College for Matrimony! I declare I almost feel like saying: "Now, lettest Him thy servant depart in peace, for at last, we have reached common sense!" It is interesting to get at the sources of things. I am always interested in seeing the sources of rivers. A child can step from stone to stone at the source of Niagara—but the rapids are not far away, and the whirlpool is near.

Oh yes, educate in every way our young people for happy marriages. The home is at the foundation—it is the foundation of our Republic.

MARGARET BOTTOME.

THE GOSPEL IN CANADIAN WILDS

ABOUT two hundred miles north of Duluth is Mine Centre, a depot and hotel in a region of woods, lakes, mines, Indians, and men of many nationalities. In a single camp one man is from Los Angeles, one is a "Stundist," one a Doukhobor; one boy is from Ohio, two from Ireland; there is one Indian, some French Canadians, and some men from nowhere in particular. A camp was recently established in the forest, where the temperature often ranges thirty-five degrees below zero. Men and horses spent many nights out in the open. There is no town for about two hundred miles south, east or north. Port Arthur and Port William lie east. They will yet become one, and form a mighty lake port. The population is increasing rapidly. They are the headquarters for all who work "in the bush," and their hotel often shelter 1,500 lumbermen. Each hotel has a bar.

The great and crying need in Port Arthur is a real home for her young men—a place with moral influences, and whose surroundings would offset the attractions of the saloon. But at present we are in the bush, and it may be truthfully said that

The sound of the church-going bell,
These valleys and rocks never heard.

As I write, I can see, outside, an Indian dog-team on the way from the little store at the "Centre." I see, too, a Chippewa and his squaw. On the counter in the store are many pelts of timber wolves. These sell at about $2.50. The storekeeper speaks readily in French and the Indian dialect. A venerable Indian enters my room uninvited, sits down and looks around in almost sullen silence. I give him a piece of pork; his stolid visage relaxes, and he shows some musk-rats just taken from his traps.

In the camps around here hundreds of men are employed. Good plain food is provided. The tables are plain boards and the dishes are all enamel. Car-loads of beef, pork, hams, etc., are disposed of with marvelous rapidity. Eggs, milk and fish are lacking. Moose meat is sometimes enjoyed. The "sleep camp" is apart from the "cook camp." Bunks, each holding two, are built in tiers. No springs or mattresses are supplied; only blankets, and possibly a little hay. A large stove, around which are hung mittens, socks and moccasins, is in the centre of the room. Here sleep choppers, sawyers, swamper, teamsters and others. There is no privacy. Sickness and accidents play their part. A doctor, often medical student, visits each camp. For the men have to pay about one dollar per month.

Pocket-knives, scissors, needles, thread, tape, laces, simple medicinal remedies, plasters, cathartics, salve and ointments, would be most helpful to the boys away from home, also testaments, etc., in English, French, German, and Russian; up-to-date magazine, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and all good reading matter. Pray for these wanderers, for whom so few seem to care.

WHILE YET IN THE WORLD

By WILLIAM H. HAMBY

"It is a good thing," said Brother Nash, as they sat around the stove before prayer-meeting opened, "that Christians will get a reward in the next world, or they don't near always get the best of this."

"Well, I don't know," said Deacon Long, "it depends on how you look at it." "No it don't," spoke up Sister Kelley, rather sharply; "there ain't any way you can look at it, but it's just as Brother Nash says. The wicked, lots of times gets the best of this world. Now, there is Cy and Lyman Toliver. There never was a better man than Brother Cy, and he's worked like a dog, and they just barely get long, and his farm has been mortgaged ever since I can remember. But Lyman always was mean and stingy, and hard-hearted, and besides, he's an infidel. He has got a fine house and servants and thousands of dollars, and just everything a body could wish for. No, sir, you can't make me believe the good people always get along the best in this world." Then she added with a sigh, "but, of course, it will be made up to them in the next."

Lyman sat by the Pullman window watching for something familiar in the landscape. He was trying to recall the scenes and faces of twenty years before. He had vowed, when he left home, that he would not return until he was a millionaire. He was not an old man yet, but his closely cropped mustache was white and there was gray about his temples. But he was still straight and his eyes were keen and cold.

He had kept his word, and was going back the first time a millionaire.

He was greeted at the station by a hearty hand-shake and a broad, cordial smile. It was Cy, hearty and good-humored as ever. The same old Cy, except a little stouter and his hair a little white. He had heard that Cy was poor, but it had not marked him with much care. His eyes were twinkling, and every line in his face indicated happiness.

It was a plain country house with plain furniture, but everything was sweet and clean. They took their chairs out on the porch, shaded by a honeysuckle vine and climbing roses. The breeze swept in from the south, cool and refreshing, after the drive in the sun.

The girls, Mary and Jane, came in with their arms full of flowers. They were decorating in his honor, but he had come sooner than they expected. They greeted him a little timidly, but with evident pleasure, as Uncle Lyman. The boys, Jim and John, came in from the field at noon, and they, too, gave him an awkward but hearty welcome.

"I haven't enjoyed anything as much in twenty years as that meal," he said to Cy as they returned to the porch after dinner.

In the cool of the afternoon they went over the little farm and looked at the meadows, and the growing corn, the sheep and the cattle. Cy seemed to love every piece of ground and every blade of grass, and pointed with pride to the color of his corn and the size of the stalks.

"When you see corn a dark green like that, with thick stalks, you're sure of a big crop."

"It seems like a good little farm," said Lyman. "How much did it cost you?"

"I was to pay four thousand, but it is still mortgaged for seven hundred."

"When is the mortgage due?" he asked. "Oh, it's been due for seven years," laughed Cy. "I keep the interest paid, of course."

"Why doesn't the party who holds the paper close you out?" asked Lyman, in surprise.

"Close me out? Why, Brother Davis, one of my nearest neighbors, holds the mortgage. He wouldn't any more think of closing me out than he would of robbing a train."

"I was just smiling," said Lyman, "to think how long my next door neighbor would let a mortgage on my house run after it was due."

That evening neighbor Evans came in. After the usual introduction, talk about the crops and the health of the family, Evans remarked:

"We're going over to help clean out Brother Cox's corn to-morrow. Guess we can count on you, Cy."

"Yes, me or one of the boys will be over."

"What is the matter with Cox?" asked Lyman, when the neighbor was gone.

"He's been down with the rheumatism and is behind with his work. Ten or fifteen of us are going over to-morrow to plough his corn."

"Why doesn't he hire it ploughed?"

"Isn't able."

"But don't you need the time on your own crop?"

"Oh, yes, the wet weather has put us a little behind; but it isn't like as if we were sick. We'll come out all right."

Lyman sat thinking for a long time. He remembered Clevenger, one of his neighbors. Clevenger was a good fellow, but he got on the wrong side of the market, and he had bankrupted him. "Meant fifty thousand to me, but was a little hard on Clevenger," he said to himself.

"There is Dawson, just watching every move I make, and a dozen others, all waiting like a pack of hungry wolves for my first slip."

Another neighbor, Egerton, had been sick when the mortgage was foreclosed, and he and his family put out of their home. It was business, of course, but somehow Cy did not seem to think so much of business as of his neighbors.

There was always a merry time evenings, in fact there were few times during the day when there was not a laugh somewhere about the house. After supper they all gathered in the sitting-room, and read and chatted, and told stories. The girls were sweet, bright girls, and the boys intelligent fellows. Lyman thought of his own wife and daughters, proud, haughty society leaders. He met them sometimes once or twice a week. He usually ate alone. He always spent the evening alone unless he went to the club.

Sunday evening Cy asked Lyman if he would go with them to church. He was on the point of making a cynical reply. It was his habit to speak of religion as a worn out superstition. His thought was to tell his brother that he had long outgrown such trivial sentimentality; but a question in his mind checked him.

"Have I?"

He had discovered to his surprise that his brother was a better informed man than he. There was no question of the times on which Cy had not read more and thought more. He found that his mind had been running in a little groove, while Cy had been growing broader by wide reading and careful thinking. Why should he say he had outgrown what his brother still believed? Yes, he would go.

The little country church, the same he attended when a boy, was filled. It was as plain as ever, but there was something worshipful in its very atmosphere. The preacher took one of the old texts, and preached a simple, direct sermon. Eloquent only in earnestness.

Lyman studied the preacher and the congregation. He saw that the preacher believed every word, and so did the people. Their faith was not clouded nor complicated. They took that all for granted—it was part of their faith.

After the benediction there was a general hand-shaking, and everyone was talking. Everyone in reach or who passed, shook hands with Cy and had some neighborly greeting. He seemed to be a friend to everybody. To some he replied seriously, to others laughingly; his warm heart shining in his face all the while.

As they went home, Lyman was very thoughtful.

"To work during the day; to rest at night; in love with one's family and one's neighbors; to believe God watches, and will guide and keep," that was his brother's life. His—

"To watch everlastingly, lest some man rob him of that which he had taken from others. To—well, that was all—the rest was incidental."

"Cy," he said, as they neared home, "I would give every cent I have if I could live like you."

"Why don't you?" asked Cy.

"That is the miserable part of it. I can't, and I have lost so much of myself that I would not be happy if I did."

Our Population in 1910

In a letter defending the estimates of population, recently issued by the Census Bureau, Director North incidentally gives an estimate of the population of the United States, under the census to be taken in 1910, placing the figure at 89,041,436. The director says that this indicates a percentage of increase of 17.2, as compared with 20.7 in the decade of 1890-1900, but he acknowledges that there are possibilities in the future development of the country which may greatly change this estimate. He thinks the estimate is likely to prove too small in cities of exceptionally rapid growth.

WISE WORDS

A Physician on Food

A physician of Portland, Oregon, has views about food. He says:

"I have always believed that the duty of the physician does not cease with treating the sick, but that we owe it to humanity to teach them how to protect their health, especially by hygienic and dietetic laws.

"With such a feeling as to my duty, I take great pleasure in saying to the public that in my own experience, and also from personal observation, I have found no food to equal Grape-Nuts, and that I find there is almost no limit to the great benefit this food will bring when used in all cases of sickness and convalescence.

"It is my experience that no physical condition forbids the use of Grape-Nuts. To persons in health there is nothing so nourishing and acceptable to the stomach, especially at breakfast, to start the machinery of the human system on the day's work. In cases of indigestion I know that a complete breakfast can be made of Grape-Nuts and cream, and I think it is necessary not to overload the stomach at the morning meal. I also know the great value of Grape-Nuts when the stomach is too weak to digest other food.

Mont-Lawn Ready to Open

MANY letters are being received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, showing that the poor children of the tenements are not forgotten. As warm weather approaches, friends are sending their offerings to be used in giving the little ones, who otherwise would be penned in the hot city, a vacation at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. Time flies swiftly, and before we realize it, the sultry weather of midsummer will be upon us, sapping the vitality of the strongest.

Every preparation is being made to have the summer of 1904 a "banner season" for the entertainment of the poor children of the slums and miserable tenements, who for at least ten days may know the joy of living in the beautiful country, where God's pure sunshine and fresh air are free, where good, wholesome food and plenty of it, put strength into the little bodies, and clean white beds ensure the sweetest rest. Of course it takes money to do all this, and it is hoped that friends of the work will be generous with their offerings. There is something in the suffering of a little child that touches every heart. They are such helpless little creatures, so at the mercy of older people, who have the power to make or mar the future lives of the little ones; and the children of the poor are so many.

A letter from Colorado Springs, Colo., encloses money for one little child, to be sent to Mont-Lawn, and very pathetic is the reference to the fact that the sum was "painfully earned by a dying girl, in order that it might be spent in the Lord's work. She has now gone to glory and left this with me. I thought more good might be done with it—immediate good—by sending it to Mont-Lawn, as she wanted it spent for children."

Another letter, dated Mulberry, Ind., encloses $6, to send two children to Mont-Lawn. The writer says: "How I would love to see the children out at this beautiful place! All I know is what I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and my prayer is, that God will raise up more workers to help in this great work in saving the children." The Ladies' Aid Society of the Trinity Reformed Church, Skippack, Pa., sends $25 to "give an outing to as many children as it will pay for." "Aunt Jerusha Maria" writes: "I have $5 for the Lord, so I guess I'll send it via THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to be used for Mont-Lawn." A very touching letter comes from Vermont, in which a dear sister sends $3. She says: "I have wished for some time that I could do something to earn money enough to give one dear little boy or girl a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn. At last I have earned the three dollars, doing mending for one of my good neighbors. It has been earned through much weariness and many aches, but I am glad I have earned it all myself. I have been very sick, so have been working slowly, and have been able to go out but little. How I wish I could see the dear little children at Mont-Lawn. May God richly bless them, and all who are doing so much for them."

Earned in weariness and pain—how much this $3 will count in the sight of the Father. And when the little child is told the story of the lady so far away, who toiled so lovingly that it might have such a good time, how grateful the little heart will be. What a lesson of unselfishness this kind act teaches.

One sad-hearted mother, whose only son was drowned, sends $10, which belonged to her boy, whom she feels sure would wish the money spent to give to some other boy a happy time at Mont-Lawn. So the gift will be doubly blest, in bringing comfort to the mother's own heart, and in helping other mothers, who have not the means to give their boys the happiness they will find during a visit to the Children's Home.

It costs but $21 to endow a cot for the whole season, which means a ten days' vacation for seven children, and $3 will give the same to one child. Children's half-worn clothing of any and all kinds will be gratefully received at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y.

Oh, Hear Ye the Call!

OH! hear ye the call of the Master!

Go work in my vineyard to-day,
Go bring in the fruits you would gather,
The harvest is passing away.
Tarry not till the day-beams have faded,
And at evening hath sunk the bright sun,
Nor meet the dear Lord empty-handed
When there is so much to be done.

Go work with a hand that is willing
And a heart that is loving and true,
In the field of the blessed Redeemer
You all can find something to do
In caring for those who would perish,
Or fainting, be lost by the way,
But for someone to tell them of Jesus
And keep them from going astray.

Go forth with a balm for the weary,
And carry a smile to the sad,
Sing sweet songs of hope to the mourner,
And anthems of peace to the glad.

E'en tho' but a cup of cold water,
Or the poor and the hungry to feed,
O, go, and do something for Jesus,
And thou shalt be blest in the deed.

Go, bearing kind words to the wayward,
Who are wandering out in the cold,
Go bring in the lost ones to Jesus,
And shelter them safe in the fold.
With your armor, the "sword of the Spirit,"
In the name of your Master and Lord,
Toil on till the harvest is ended,
And abundant shall be thy reward.

Oh! hear ye the call of the Master!
Go work in my vineyard to-day,
Go bring in the fruits you would gather.
Arise! and no longer delay.
Give the Saviour your time and your talent,
No matter how small it may be,
Linger not till the shadows have gathered,
For the Master hath need e'en of thee.

Books Received

India, and Christian Opportunity, by Harlan P. Beach. A book for the use of volunteer mission students. Pp. 308; illustrated; cloth covers. Price 50 cents. Student Volunteer Movement, New York, publishers.

The Heart of Rome, a Tale of the Lost Water, by Francis Marion Crawford. A very romantic and interesting story. Pp. 307; paper cover; price 25 cts. The Macmillan Company, London and New York, publishers.

What Jesus is Doing, by J. F. Shorey. This volume is a collection of testimonies, of how regeneration by the Holy Spirit destroys the appetite for strong drink, beginning with the life story of the author. Published by Alfred Holness, 13-14 Paternoster Row London, E. C.

The Louisiana Purchase and the Exploration, Early History and Building of the West, by Ripley Hitchcock. A timely, succinct and convenient book, which gives a clear and simple history of events which every American ought to know. Pp. 349; illustrated; cloth covers. Price $1.25. Ginn & Co., New York, Boston and Chicago, publishers.

New History of the United States, by Edward Eggleston. Up-to-date and freely illustrated with maps, etc.; about 450 pages; cloth covers. Steps in English (Books I and II); illustrated; Stelling by Grades, Carpenter's Geographical Reader; illustrated; are all issued by the American Book Co., New York, Cincinnati & Chicago, publishers.

Stories from Life, by Orson Swett Marden. A volume of "eclectic school readings," containing sketches from the lives of successful men. The author's object has been to show young people that no matter how humble their birth or circumstances, they may make their lives such as will be held up as examples to future generations. American Book Company, Publishers, New York.

Women's Ways of Earning Money, by Cynthia Westover Alden. This volume is full of suggestions for women, who, from choice or necessity, are facing the problem of how to earn a living. Mrs. Alden is a woman of wide experience, which she does not hesitate to draw upon in illustrating the necessary equipment for certain lines of work. The suggestions are definite and practical, and therefore cannot fail of being very helpful. A wide field of activities is covered in a very interesting way, and no glittering generalities are indulged in. From cooking for sixteen farm hands, on a Western ranch, to an editorial position upon a big New York daily, seems a far cry, but this is what the author gives as part of her own work in life, with many intermediate stations, embracing teaching, singing, matron, superintendent, Custom House inspectress, and street cleaning department secretary. Small 12mo., cloth, illustrated, $1. Published by A. S. Barnes & Co., New York.

Hopes of the World's Peace

Judge Gray's Address at the Mohonk Conference

JUDGE GEORGE GRAY, the well-known Jurist and former Senator from Delaware, presided at the Conference on International Arbitration, recently held at Lake Mohonk, N. Y. Judge Gray was member of the Peace Commission in Paris, in 1898, and became a member of the Joint High Commission at Quebec, in the same year. In 1900, he was appointed one of the four American representatives at the International Court of Arbitration at the Hague. As president of the anarchist strike commission two years ago, he took a conspicuous part in settling the great conflict in the coal regions. At the recent Conference in Washington, looking at the negotiation of an arbitration treaty with Great Britain, Judge Gray was present and took a prominent part in the proceedings. In his opening address to-day, Judge Gray said in part:

It was a noble effort of a few noble men ten years ago, to lead the public opinion of the country in the direction of international arbitration. It is true they represented the advanced thought of our time, but advanced thought meets with many discouragements. Statesmanship was indifferent and practical politics hostile. Good people the world over listened to the dreams of the dreamers, but they thought they knew better than to expect that those dreams should ever be realities. They did not see, or did not recognize, the spiritual ferment which was everywhere stirring the minds and hearts of men; and so to-day we are following rather than leading public opinion toward the goal of peaceful arbitration of international differences, and to a realizing sense of the waste and folly of international war. The economic waste consequent upon the maintenance of the great and increasing military and naval establishments of the world beginning to make its due impression upon the enlightened conscience and intelligence of increasing numbers in all countries. Altruism is no longer to be banished from national policies and national conduct, and there is a growing recognition of the truth that the obligations of the moral law are imposed upon nations as well as upon individuals. Public opinion is no longer fenced in by national boundaries. It has overleaped them, and now an international public opinion is making itself felt from one corner of Christendom to the other, and, through the instrumentality of a free press, forecasts and controls the conduct and policies of kings and empires. The establishment and continued existence of the permanent Court of International Arbitration will make it more difficult in the future than it has been in the past for nations to engage in war. I believe that its influence will grow slowly but steadily, and that each resort to its decisions will tend to form and strengthen the habit of looking thitherward to settle international difficulties by an appeal to reason instead of by an appeal to arms.

As for ourselves, we are bound by our own past. There is no more glorious page in our history than that which records its lists of arbitral agreements and establishes its leadership in upright diplomacy and peaceful settlement of international difficulties. That international law is no longer the sport of kings and a mockery of the hopes of humanity, is largely due to the assertion of its obligations by the statesmen of our formative period. "The parliament of man and the federation of the world" is emerging from the mist of poetry to the sunlight of the practical world. When American diplomacy secures an open port from China it is not for American commerce alone, but for the commerce of the world. A selfish, sordid, aggressive or merely a self-starving national policy will be more difficult to maintain in the future than it has been in the past. Our own national conduct must more and more conform to the enlightened conscience of the country, and will more and more have applied to it the test of morality as well as of self-interest.

Judge Gray then referred to the submission by the United States and Great Britain to an arbitral tribunal of the difficult questions arising out of the disputed Alaskan boundary, which had so long vexed the diplomacy, and menaced the peace of both countries, and to the submission to the Hague Tribunal of the claims urged against Venezuela by two or three of the most powerful nations of the world, as two notable triumphs in the cause of international arbitration since the last meeting of the Conference. In conclusion he said:

I trust that I am not too optimistic. I fully realize that there are yet many difficulties to overcome and that stout hearts and a firm purpose are necessary to the accomplishment, even in part, of the object we have in view. But we have passed through the stage of indifference, and contest now with those who oppose would only strengthen our cause. The growing civilization of our time, the broader humanity and more catholic spirit that characterize the generation now on the stage, the diffusion of intelligence and the freer intercommunication of thought between the peoples of the world have brought to our side the most generous impulses and pious aspirations of the day in which we live. We hail the oncoming years of the new century with high hopes and renewed faith.

ONCE A LABORER, NOW A PRINCE

The Romantic Story of Michael Hilkoﬀ's Career

THE emancipation of the serfs by the great Czar, Alexander II, grandfather of the present Emperor, ruined the father of Prince Michael Hilkoﬀ (or, as it is spelled in Russian, Khilkov), and sent the son forth into exile. A bitter quarrel followed between father and son, as a result of which Michael Hilkoﬀ renounced his ancestral titles and estates, resigned his office at court, and sailed for America as a common emigrant. He landed at Philadelphia, and his poverty was so great that to secure employment was an immediate necessity.

The first opening that offered was a job tending a bolt-making machine, at wages of a day.

"Your name?" asked the foreman, when he reported for work.

"Mi-kale," began the young Russian slowly, his tongue hesitating when it came to English. "Magill, heh?" snapped back the busy foreman. "Well, what's your first name?"

"John," answered the Prince, deciding on the moment that that would do as well as anything. And so he was fitted with a new name, which served him for a good many years.

After a year or two in the machine shops, during which the Prince was studying mechanical engineering, he found a place as fireman on a freight train. Later he became a locomotive engineer, and he added to his practical knowledge acquired in that way thorough technical and theoretical knowledge acquired by study after hours.

Presently he was promoted again. This time he became superintendent of a railroad in South America. There, also, he lived several years, when, finally, a longing for his old home in Russia seized him, which he was not able to resist. He went back, still concealing his princely name and station, and secured a place on one of the Russian railroads. It was an obscure place in an obscure Russian village, but Michael Hilkoﬀ, or John Magill, was not destined to remain in obscurity.

Presently an emergency arose, connected with the movement of trains at the junction point where he was stationed, and in that emergency the technical skill and practical training of Hilkoﬀ showed itself in a way to attract the attention of his immediate superiors, and to win, in the end, even the notice of the Czar himself. Under orders from headquarters he was promoted as rapidly as he showed capacity for a higher place. Finally, under close questioning, he revealed his identity as a Russian Prince, and as a former officer in the Guard of the Russian Empress. Then followed the story of his romantic and inspiring career as an emigrant to America, and of his work there as a railroad man and student. The Russian Emperor was delighted to find that the young man who had displayed such great capacity and skill was one of his own subjects. He restored to the master of railroading all the princely estates which he had voluntarily given up years before, and he added other and even more desirable marks of his personal favor. Presently Prince Michael Hilkoﬀ was made Imperial Minister of Railways and Transportation, and became a member of the Cabinet of the Czar.

Hilkoﬀ's masterwork and the monument by which he will be longest remembered, is the great Trans-Siberian Railroad, to the construction and equipment of which he, next to the Emperor, lent the greatest impetus.—H. M. Hyde, in The Technical World, Chicago.

Roof/Leak?

applied on an old leaky shingle, tin or felt roof will make it absolutely waterproof. Stops the rusting process in tin or iron, and stops warping or rotting of shingles. Will add ten years to the life of a new or old roof.

ROOF LEAK is the most durable sun or winter proof paint or coating possible to make. Does not crack in winter or soften in summer. Easily applied. Imparts no taste to water.

ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP renders the wood absolutely weatherproof, and when the shingles are nailed on the roof, they become cemented together so tightly that warping, which causes cracked shingles and loose nails, is positively prevented.

ROOF LEAK is shipped in the heavy liquid cement form, and is applied as received on worn and leaky surfaces. It is reduced with one quart of boiled linseed-oil to each gallon, if used as a durable paint on surfaces in good condition. Shingle Dip is shipped ready for dipping.

ROOF LEAK COATING AND ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP are made in Black, Maroon, and Dark Green. Five gallons up to any quantity, 75c. per gallon, freight paid east of Denver. Returnable at our expense, if not approved.

ROOF LEAK is sold by up-to-date paint and hardware dealers. Those who try to sell you something else are not doing you justice, because "there is nothing else like ROOF LEAK."

Liquid samples, together with an interesting booklet showing its various uses, will be sent on request, or to enable you to give it a practical test, we will send you for $1.00, delivered free to your door, one gallon, which is sufficient for cementing 100 square feet of leaky surface, or painting 200 square feet. One gallon of Shingle Dip covers about 400 square feet shingles, both sides.

Africa's Missionary Problems*

MANY and diverse are the problems of the African mission field. We are now only beginning to realize how difficult they are. Happily the minds of able and experienced men are concentrating upon them and are waiting on God, as the source of all wisdom, for power in their solution.

One of the most serious and embarrassing problems is the effect on the native mind of the treatment the natives receive at the hands of the white representatives of civilized and professedly Christian governments. It is difficult to make them understand what right European nations have to partition their continent among themselves. Still more difficult is it to explain to them the horrible brutalities practiced by the Belgian rulers of the Congo. As they look at men and women whose hands have been chopped off for not bringing in enough rubber, or for some other offence, it is no wonder that they are prejudiced against a religion which does not restrain men supposed to possess it, from such outrageous cruelties. Then, too, they see their people demoralized by the intoxicating liquor the white man has introduced. They see their people being driven like cattle to work for the white man's profit and being ruined by his vices. How can the missionary cope with prejudices produced by such causes?

Another serious problem is the capacity of the people themselves. This differs widely. In the northern, or Mohammedan sections, there is more intelligence than in the central districts. Dr. Laws' account of his effort to get a boy to learn to read is one of the most impressive stories of discouraging work ever penned, and it applies to all central Africa. Then there is the moral problem. How is it possible to convince a man whose ancestors from far away times were polygamists, that he ought not to have many wives and ought not to treat them so cruelly?

We are thankful to learn that while these problems still remain, and while there is still the awful difficulty of the climate, that kills the white man with such fearful certainty, an advance is being made. Dr. Hartzell's report to the Los Angeles Conference, and other reports from missionaries of other faiths, prove that souls even there are being won for Christ.

Progress in India†

OUT of affliction is coming good. Never in the history of India have the missionaries had so many grounds for encouragement as they have had since the two terrible famines of 1897 and 1900. From the many correspondents that this journal has in that land, there come letters of good cheer. Districts which rejected the missionary, now welcome him, and Bishop Warne mentions in his recent report, with thankfulness, that, as an almost unprecedented thing, applications have come spontaneously from native communities for Christian teaching. This is doubtless due in part to the magnificent generosity of the Christian lands to the people of India in the time of their sore need. The leaders of their own faith were generally indifferent to their suffering. The starving were left to die unpitied and unrelieved. It was from the Christian missionary that they received food, and he explained to them that the beneficence was the effect of Christ's principles working in the hearts of his followers. A religion which impels its believers to relieve suffering, demonstrates its superiority and commands itself to public esteem. Our readers had much to do with this work, and have a right to thank God for the privilege of which they so generously availed themselves.

*Topic of the Epworth League for June 26. Isa. 19: 17-21.

†Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for June 26. Ps. 22: 22-31.

Another most encouraging sign, is in the result of our orphan work. It is now evident that a very large majority of those five thousand children whom our readers are supporting, will leave the orphanages sincere Christians. The missionaries who have charge of them, report that those who have already been received into communion, are showing by their lives that they have understood the principles of Christianity, and that they will so manifest them among their people as to win souls to Christ by example and precept. Who can tell what the result of five thousand young Christians being sent out into the villages of their land may be?

Among other hopeful signs in India are the large numbers of educated Hindus now inquiring about Christianity. The lower castes are thoroughly permeated with the truth, the sweeper caste having already given 100,000 converts to Christianity. Now the weaver caste, two million strong, is asking for teachers, and on all sides there are signs of spiritual harvest.

The Czar's Daily Drive

If his governmental system makes him the most absolute head of a State in Christendom, the Czar is personally the least assuming monarch imaginable, writes the St. Petersburg correspondent of the Sun. His children drive in a pair-horse open carriage down the Nevski with their governess, about three o'clock every afternoon. Coachman and footman wear no livery, merely the black hat and long drab coat usual in a private citizen's equipage. The Czar's mother, with her lady-in-waiting, were driving recently in a pair-horse sleigh not distinguishable from any other good turnout, but for the great-bearded Cossack standing guard behind them. And the Dowager Czarina, by the habit of the country and the code of the Greek Orthodox Church, comes before the Czarina in every form of influence and precedence. The Czar-ewitch constantly uses his private droschke unattended on busy streets, and looks a much robust man physically and mentally than his imperial brother. This unescorted passing about among the people of members of the Czar's family is not what common report would lead the foreigner to expect here. On the footwalk there are, of course, secret service men every few yards and all day. They, alone, are about to counter the movement of which some may think but nobody speaks, and in plain truth the Czar's ally, the French President, moves among the public with more display of his high office than the Czar does here.

Cuban Converts Start a Mission

How Gospel work multiplies itself is strikingly shown in the case of a little mission, which has lately been established some six miles from the town of Gibara, Cuba. In Gibara there is a thriving parent mission, which has been supported by the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions and conducted by its trained workers. A number of the converts in the Gibara Mission felt the call to active service, and concluded they could do no better than to found and support a mission of their own, which they have now done. It is in the little village of Potter, Mo., where such a work was greatly needed. A faithful member of the Gibara Church walks seven miles to the new mission, with his wife, to attend divine services. On a recent afternoon the church was crowded with worshippers, who listened attentively for two hours to a sermon on the seven sayings of Jesus on the Cross. The sermon was preached by Juan Francisco Galvez, a native Cuban. The converts have organized committees, and visit the homes of the people, inviting them to the special services and distributing Gospel tracts. A flourishing Christian Endeavor Society and three Sunday Schools are kept up by this church. All the work is in the Spanish language. Rev. Sylvester Jones is pastor of the Friends' Church at Gibara, with general charge of the work.

Appreciation from South Africa

Dear "Christian Herald": The Red Letter Bible and Testament with Butterfly Calendar arrived, after going nearly 10,000 miles, in splendid order, speaks well for the packing. The Bible and Testament is splendid. They are all good value. How I Worked My Way Around the World is a most interesting book. It is difficult to know how you can give away such good premiums.

HAS TRIED BOTH

Travel for Health vs. Dieting

A man who was sent to Europe for his health and finally found permanent relief in a little change in his diet, says:

"I was troubled with dyspepsia for five years, and two doctors here in Kenosha that treated me for over a year, both told me there was no help for me. Then I had an expert from Chicago, but still received no relief; then followed another expert from Chicago who came to our house two times a month for four months. He gave me up like all the others and told me to take a trip across the ocean, which I did in the year 1899, and came home about as bad as when I started. The doctors told me my stomach lining was full of sores. Then I began to study my own case, and learned of the diet recommended by the Postum Cereal Co., so I gave up coffee, pork and all greasy foods and began using Postum Food Coffee. Gradually I got better and better, until I am well now as I ever was in my younger days, have no trouble, and eat anything fit to eat.

"Sometimes away from home I am persuaded to drink coffee, but I only take a sip of it, for it tastes bitter and disagreeable to me, but the longer I use Postum the better I like it, and the better I feel. I could say a great deal more of my experience with Postum, but think this will give everyone a good idea of what leaving off coffee and using Postum can do." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

CHRIST'S TRIUMPH

By MRS. M. BAXTER

It seemed at one period of our Lord's life, as though a movement had commenced which would end in his proclaiming himself the chosen Messiah, and restoring again the kingdom to Israel, according to the many prophecies of the then written Scriptures. But, although the multitudes acknowledged him, there was already a strong party, which determinedly set themselves to oppose Jesus of Nazareth. This manifested itself first at Nazareth (Luke 4: 28-30). After this a system of espionage was established, and our Lord could go nowhere without being followed by criticizing "Pharisees and doctors of the law, who came out of every village of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem." What was the reason of this? When the Lord Jesus testified to the multitudes concerning John the Baptist, "the people, when they heard, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected themselves the counsel of God, being not baptized of him" (Luke 7: 29, 30). He who rejects the messenger whom God sends to call him to repentance, has no one to see him who has come to save. Thus, among those in power, the kingdom and the King whom God had exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins (Acts 5: 31), were rejected by the authorities of the Jews. The kingdom might have been restored to Israel, but the same people who had wanted the kingdom in Samuel's time, that they might be like the nations, rejected God's chosen King, his own Son, when he was offered them. But his disciples must see and understand who he was, and on the Mount of Transfiguration Peter must see that he had not been mistaken in his confession that Jesus was the Christ, and the chosen one must hear the voice of the Father from heaven saying: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him" (Matt. 17: 5). On the mountain, the converse between him and the glorified Moses, and Elijah was of "his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem;" and he handed back the kingdom to the Father, until he should have fulfilled all that is meant in his title: "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the Word."

From the Transfiguration, all pointed to Calvary. The mission of the seventy was to prepare his way in that last journey up to Jerusalem. He had already taught the parables of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13), a kingdom with an unseen King; a kingdom of God which is within, and most of his teaching of the kingdom from this time refers to this hidden kingdom, which is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 13: 17). His life became more than ever a life of prayer—claiming the promise, and of watchfulness. As we learn in the prodigal son, the heart of God the Father is towards the wanderer who had destroyed himself, and we think of the words: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thine help" (Hos. 13: 9). Only in the Cross, where our Lord took all human nature in his own person to be condemned and executed, could there be a righteous salvation for guilty man; a way home for the sinful, selfish prodigal.

And this lesson of the Cross we see in the Passover—that last Passover which he so earnestly desired to eat with his chosen ones before he suffered, and he would no more eat thereof until it was "fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Oh, the memory of that night! How could those disciples ever forget it! And when, after he was risen, he opened their understanding to understand the Scripture, how they must have wondered at the unutterable love and patience of him, the true Passover Lamb, who had borne with them in their ignorance and hardness of heart, when he saw what was coming upon him. He was taken up with the awful load of the world's sin, and they were striving who of them should be the greatest.

I could never have argued three million people into eating "FORCE" regularly if they hadn't liked the taste of it.

No matter how proper and fit a food may be, it must be appetizing, too.

Sunny Jim

Do you know where hunger comes from? You feel it in the stomach; but it's really the whole body and brain calling to be fed. That's why some foods leave you hungry. They don't feed the whole body. That's why a little "FORCE" goes a great way. It feeds you all over.

War and Arbitration

UDGING from the readiness with which nations go to war for trivial causes, the people are evidently departing further and further from God. Wars usually settle great principle. After the useless shedding of much blood, the vanquished are forced to accept the terms imposed on them, and that all there is of it.

Wars usually have their origin in a lack of knowledge of God. Isaiah (5: 13) says: "Therefore my people have gone into captivity because they have no knowledge." Hosea (4: 6) says: "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." The nations of the earth generally stand in need of the following: "The entrance of thy words giveth light; giveth understanding unto the simple" (Ps. 119: 130). "A good understanding have all they that do his commandments" (Ps. 111: 1). But so long as sin remains on the earth, it so long will some restraining force be necessary to prevent wars.

Arbitration, substantially on the following plan, appears to be the best means that can possibly be devised for preventing wars:

I. All the nations of the earth (about seventy-three nations in all) should enter into a league that all questions of variance must be settled by arbitration.

II. Each nation shall select a proper representative to serve a suitable length of time, say four years. Some central point is to be selected, and the necessary buildings provided for the accommodation of said representatives. III. The said representatives shall be convened once a year, and remain in session a suitable length of time, say ten months. During the continuance of said session they will act as a Court of Arbitration on all questions that may be submitted.

IV. Any question of variance that may arise between two or more of the several nations shall be submitted to said Court of Arbitration, which will proceed to examine the same in all its details. After proper time has been given for adjustment, the matter shall be decided by a majority vote of all the representatives.

V. Any decision that may have been rendered shall be final. No appeal.

VI. If any nation, contrary to the regulations of said Court of Arbitration, engage in acts of war and thereby cause the loss of a single life, the Court of Arbitration shall impose a sufficient fine on the offending nation to cover all damages.

VII. With arbitration firmly planted on the above or some similar basis, an advancement in the cause of Christianity will then be possible.

"I hate that drum's discordant sound
Parading round and round and round,
To thoughtless youth it pleasure yields
And lures from cities, farms and fields,
To sell their country for the charms
Of tawdry lace and glittering arms,
And when ambition's call demands,
To fight and fall in foreign lands."

A Philanthropic Hint

A charitable enterprise was carried on last summer, which may be suggestive to the philanthropist. A lady, whose beautiful residence close to the Riverside Drive, has usually, like most such New York houses, remained untenanted during the long summer, determined last year to make it useful to others. Stripping the principal rooms of their furniture and ornaments, she placed them at the disposal of the parish of Christ Episcopal Church for four months, to be used as a home for invalid children from the tenement-houses. The result proved most satisfactory, and, in many cases, deeply gratifying. The children, many of them between the ages of two and five years, came from the hospitals, convalescent after serious illness, or from the clinic, or from the unwholesome and dangerous conditions of the tenement-house in summer. They have gone out from this temporary home—some after a few days, some after many weeks of abundant fresh air and loving care—wonderfully benefited, and in most cases fully restored. The experiment was successful in another point, which might have been open to doubt. The children never once trespassed on the front stairway or other parts of the house which were not for their use, and no damage of any significance was done to the house. The question may well be asked, Why may not others make like use of their city homes in summer? M. B. C.

B. E. S., Biloxi, Miss. In a recent conversation with an acquaintance, he claimed to be able to come out of the body, and appear in spirit to others.

You must have misunderstood him, or he must have been talking nonsense. That is the most charitable construction we can put upon such a case.

W. L., Idaho Falls, Idaho. 1. Have the necessary funds for the Peary Expedition been raised? 2. What is the correct date of Paul du Chaillu's birth?

1. We believe so. 2. Paul du Chaillu, according to the Crown, the Britannica and the New Century Encyclopedia, was born in 1835.

W. A. W., Central City, Ia., writes:

I have been in Christian work, now, some nine months... making a house-to-house canvass, distributing tracts and conversing with people. Have succeeded in persuading thirteen (in about four days), to make a start in the Christian life. They signed a pledge to that effect.

Here is an example of work that can be done by many who may have a desire to be in active service. To lead some poor, lost soul to the light, or some wandering backslider back, is a great privilege and blessing. A word, a kind act, even a tract, may be the turning-point. See Ezk. 3:18, 19.

Mrs. J. H. F., Canada.

What was the origin of the Christadelphians? What are their distinguishing doctrines?

The Christadelphian body originated in the work and teaching of Dr. John Thomas, who came to America, from England, in 1832. He was originally associated with Mr. Campbell, the leader of the Disciples of Christ, but in 1836 the two separated, and, though Dr. Thomas was afterwards allowed to preach in some of the Churches of the Disciples, the bulk of them repudiated him. He continued his work by preaching, and publishing magazines and books, until his death, in 1871. One of his most prominent doctrines, which is still held by Christadelphians, is that the soul is not inherently immortal, but that men derive immortality through Christ, and that the wicked are annihilated, or have no resurrection. He taught the personal reign of Christ, and that Christ's people would occupy the world after the millennium and would live forever. They have no organized churches or any regular ministry. Baptism is by immersion only. They accept the Bible as the Word of God, though denying that Christ is divine, in the orthodox sense.

Mrs. W. V. P., Waldo, Fla. I was very much interested in the article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on dancing, condemned by the Methodist Conference. I see ahead a great danger to the young people in this respect. Will you make a special appeal to ministers of all denominations to investigate the condition of young members of their churches? I have a son twenty years old, working in a Southern city. This is a sentence from one of his letters: "You caution me about dancing. Will say that the young men or women who refuse to dance and play cards, though members of the church, are very few here. All do so mostly." Something is creeping into the church that will break down the very stronghold of sacredness, if this whole-side dancing and card-playing is not stopped.

The condition of affairs you complain of is all too common among church members, both in city and country. It is an evil that should be fought earnestly by the pastors and by all of God's people in the churches, who desire progress in the Spiritual life. Indulgence in worldly amusements is sapping the vitality of many churches.

Subscriber, Ravenna, O. 1. Is it right to attend communion when you have been sinning? 2. Is it right to go after the mail on Sunday?

1. Not if you have repented, and, asking God's forgiveness, have put the sin resolutely behind you. 2. If it be not a matter of absolute necessity, or a work of mercy, then it should not be done on the Lord's day.

Reader, Trenton, N. J. Have we any accurate scientific data upon which to form a reasonable conclusion as to the nature of the surroundings in the region of the North Pole—whether it is surrounded by land or by sea?

In the current issue of The National Geographic Magazine, Prof. R. A. Harris, of the ventures on their return. It is said that Capt. John Keenan, of Troy, N. Y., master of a whaling vessel, clearly saw the polar island some thirty years ago, but did not attempt to reach it.

Mrs. W. J. C., Aurora, Ill. Where was the country called Arsareth, mentioned in the Second Book of Esdras?

It is supposed to have been a region beyond the river Euphrates, apparently of considerable extent. It is not mentioned anywhere except in the passage mentioned.

Emma S., Saugerties, N. Y. 1. What is the population of Morocco? 2. Of what race are the people? 3. What is their religion? 4. Are they civilized or barbarous?

1. The population is variously estimated at from 3,000,000 to 9,000,000, no census ever having been taken. The former is Dr. Rohf's estimate and is probably nearest the the agricultural, mineral and other resource of the country are almost wholly undeveloped. Their language and literature, too, have become degraded.

J. C. Williams, Junction City, Ark. If the heathen who have never heard the Gospel may be saved, as you appear to think, why send them the Gospel at all?

We have never stated, or implied, that the heathen may be saved without the Gospel. Neither have we said that they would be lost. It is not for any man to limit God's mercy. He will be just. You may be quite sure of that. Our part is to do our duty and leave the rest to him. Jesus bade us preach the Gospel to every nation in the whole world and we are surprised that you should ask "Why send them the Gospel at all?" Is not his command a sufficient reason? Besides, the Gospel has something more in it than the salvation of the soul. It makes men better and happier in this life. It is so great a blessing, that we should be wickedly selfish if we did not take it to the heathen. There is no doubt that it increases the responsibility of those who hear. As Paul said (II Cor. 2:16) to some, it is "the savour of death unto death, but with that we have nothing to do. The ought to have the opportunity, as far as we are able to give it then of accepting the offer of the Gospel which is able, as any Christian who has felt its power will tell you, to transform and ennoble the lives.

E., Royalton, Pa. In what ways has the name Mary, and its variants been the synonym of misfortune?

The name comes from a Hebrew word meaning "bitter." Its variants are Maria, Marya, Maryan, Miriam, May, etc. Many bearers of the name have been marked by the tragical lives. Among them are Queen Mary (known as Blood Mary), and Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots. Still the name is the one most honored among women throughout the world, being that of the mother of the Saviour of men.

THE INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY UNION, AT CLIFTON SPRINGS, N. Y.

THE twenty-first annual meeting of the International Missionary Union closed on Tuesday evening, June 7, one of the best series of annual sessions in its history. The Union is generously and delightfully entertained for a full week every year at Clifton Springs, a gracious and fully appreciated hospitality. Its president, Dr. Gracey, was present, though unable to preside. Fourteen foreign Missionary Societies and eighteen foreign countries were represented. Seven young persons present are under appointment by their respective societies, and soon to go on service abroad. There were thirty-nine persons expecting to return to their fields during the year. From the meeting of recognition and of welcome to the last tender farewell, the tone was that of full, glad consecration to the common service of Christ for human redemption. There was no hint of denominationalism, no personal ambition, no assumption of any kind. There were earnest discussions of those vital missionary problems which are met with on the several fields. Six two-hour sessions were devoted to discussions by experts, of the relation of Christianity to the several forms of religion with which it heralds come in contact in the far-off lands. Men testified of the things their eyes had seen and their ears had heard. When such men as Dr. Ashmore, of China; Dr. Nassau, of Africa; Dr. Scott and Dr. Boggs, of India; Dr. Bingham, of Micronesia; or, among younger men, Dr. Huntley, of China, or Dr. Wanless, of India, are on their feet, those who are so happy as to be in the audience (there were sometimes five hundred persons present), require no spur to their attention.

WITH forgotten duster tucked under her arm, the maiden in the illustration is so absorbed in the book she has taken from the library shelf, that she has evidently become oblivious to everything except the fascination of the page before her. Dusting and putting the room in order are of secondary importance, as the girl slips her finger between the pages, ready to hurriedly turn the leaf as her interest in the tale increases. The absorbed expression upon the girl's face indicates that she will not be likely to lay the book down until her curiosity is satisfied, and she has read the last word.

CONFERENCE HEADQUARTERS AT MOHONK, VIEWED FROM SKY TOP

BENJAMIN F. TRUEBLOOD, LL.D.

FOR THE PEACE OF THE WORLD

The Work of the Tenth Annual Arbitration
Conference at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., Reviewed

NO lake is framed in lovelier hills and valleys than Mohonk, and nowhere has a Conference met that was more worthy to be called the vanguard of humanity. This year the Conference has had a much larger representation of diplomats and business men than ever before, the very reinforcements needed to ensure accelerated progress on practical lines. All sects and sections are here in heartfelt union. The presiding officer, Judge George Gray, is a member of the Hague Court, and was president of the Coal Strike Arbitration Commission. Senor J. M. Lamboa, of Mexico, who spoke of Mexico's hearty sympathy with this reform, is also a member of the Hague Court. Mr. Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, was one of the original Venezuela Commission. Another speaker, Mr. J. H. Ralston, has presided over one of the mixed Commissions that adjudicated the various claims upon Venezuela. An Italian member of one of these Commissions also spoke, and declared Italy's sympathy with the reform. Although all partisan references to the present Eastern War were debarred, Baron Kentaro Kanoke, ex-member of the Japanese Cabinet, spoke with the utmost good taste of Japan's loyalty to arbitration since 1875. Among other jurists who spoke were Supreme Judges of Rhode Island, Connecticut and the District of Columbia—J. H. Simes, Simeon E. Baldwin and T. H. Anderson.

Sixteen delegates from Chambers of Commerce and from kindred business associations condensed tremendous messages into five minute speeches, that showed very conclusively that war anywhere is the foe of business everywhere.

There was only one test of membership—a desire for the increased use of international arbitration, but those thus brought together, proved to be, with hardly an exception, active Christians, who followed the opening prayer of each day with manifest reliance upon "the God of peace," more than all else, for the success of their cause. The roll of the Conference was so notable, that it will stand as a token of the progress and strength of the movement. The ideals of international concord were confidently held up and approved in applause of faith and hope. Mr. Justice Brewer, of the Supreme Court, quoted, and the audience again approved:

God will make divinely real,
The highest form of thine ideal.

The goal set up by this Conference was not the doctrine of non-resistance. As Dr. Lyman Abbott said, the Conference would rather unite on Herbert Spencer's word, "Non-oppression." The Conference was not a Quaker meeting, though of Quaker origin. It was not a peace conference, but distinctively an "arbitration conference." About half its members, chiefly newcomers, showed sympathy with the doctrine that "big armaments are a guarantee of peace," whose absurdity is seen when the theory is applied to individuals. There agree to refer all international quarrels that cannot be settled by diplomacy. Mr. Justice Brewer declared that although the Hague Court was imperfect, it was "the beginning of the end." Mr. J. B. Henderson, Jr., argued that the International Court should be "a permanent court," its judges always ready for judicial action, lest delay give popular passion and demagoguery opportunity to precipitate war. Mr. Horace White, cited as such a case, the alliance of England and Turkey in the Crimean War. Prof. John Bascom Moore urged that the International Court should have an international police, for which precedents were found in the Peking relief force of many nationalities, and in the mixed force that executed the decrees of an International Court in recent years in Egypt; but the general sentiment was that the "international public opinion," which has enforced every one of the two hundred arbitrations thus far held, might be trusted to enforce those of the future. Prof. Moore and others urged, with the concurrence of the whole Conference, that the dangerous exception in the Olney arbitration treaty with Great Britain, for "questions affecting the national honor," should not hereafter be made, since almost any international question could be considered one of "honor." He recalled that the Geneva arbitration of the Alabama Claims, repeatedly spoken of in the Conference as "the high water mark of arbitration," was delayed for years, because Lord John Russell declared that the matter was "one affecting Her Majesty's honor, of which Her Majesty's Government was the sole custodian." Prof. Moore and others thought that the exception usually made in arbitration treaties for "vital interests," that is, questions of life and death to the nations involved, would have to be allowed, at least for the present.

Another new feature of the ideal, first advocated this year by Hon. J. I. Gilbert, and approved by the Conference in its "platform," is that there should be an "Advisory International Conference," in which official representatives of all nations desiring to co-operate should meet and talk over their common interests, and make recommendations to their several Governments. Ex-Congressman Coombs proposed also, that the time

HON. H. B. F. MACFARLAND THE PEACE FLAG

was scarcely any open advocacy of absolute peace, or even of the early disarmament of nations, although probably half the Conference, especially its veterans, believe that nations may and will do exactly what individuals have done in putting off their "burdensome armor," and referring all their disputes to legal adjudication.

The avowed ideal of the whole Conference was an International Court, to which all nations will ultimately

A STONE IN THE PATH

THE occasion of this admonition was an act of intolerance on the part of the disciples, and particularly of John the Beloved. He had come to Jesus saying, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us." And Jesus said, "Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me." He then proceeded to emphasize the importance of helping and not hindering those who are trying to do their best. "For whosoever," he said, "shall give you a cup of cold water to drink in my name, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward; and whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into the depths of the sea."

The word rendered "offenses" is skandalon, which we have in our English words scandal and scandalized. Its literal meaning is a stumbling-block. Its significance, in this connection, is due to the fact that life is an uphill journey. One of Christina Rossetti's poems begins in this way: "Does the road wind up hill all the way? Yes, to the very end!" If that be so, how important it is that we should help and not hinder those who, worn and weary at the best, pursue the journey of life.

"It must needs be that offenses come." We oftentimes do harm and impede the wayfarer without intending it. Influence is an automatic thing; it does not ask to be exerted, it exerts itself. No man liveth to himself, and, alas! no man dieth to himself. It is a serious thing to live, because our lives are so inextricably linked with other lives. We are like Alpine climbers, bound to one another, ever helping up or dragging down those who journey with us.

"But woe to him by whom the offense cometh!" Let us pause a moment here, lest the matter be pressed too far. You may offend a man's vanity, his ignorance or his prejudice; which is not a bad thing to do. Light is a stumbling-block to darkness. Truth is an offense to error. It is written of Christ himself that he was "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense." His preaching was so full of "hard sayings" that he was moved to utter the caveat, "Blessed is he that is not offended in me." His manner of life gave constant offense to the bigotry and self-righteousness of his enemies. He made no apology for his disciples when the Pharisees took umbrage at their plucking the wheat as they walked through the fields on the Holy Day. His Cross is a perpetual occasion of offense to the ungodly. It is written, "We preach Christ crucified; to the Greeks foolishness and to the Jews a stumbling block; but to them that are saved, both Jews and Greeks, the wisdom and power of God."

Right and Wrong Hindrances

We conclude that it is no sin, but rather a virtue, to offend the evil propensities of human nature. The sin lies in offending what is right and noble and divine in every man. For no one is so abandoned that he has not scruples and compunctions of conscience and longings for that which is highest and best. See that ye offend not those! It was with this moral sense of humanity in mind that Paul said, with reference to the meats which had been offered on the idol-altars of Corinth, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth." Had this abstinence involved the sacrifice of any moral principle on the part of the apostle, it would have been manifestly wrong in him to consent to it; but inasmuch as his own conscience was not pained by the sacrifice, while the weak consciences of the Christians of Corinth would have been grievously offended by his indulgence, he assumed an attitude of noble self-denial in protesting thus that he was willing to do all, suffer all, surrender all, in behalf of their welfare. To persist in any procedure which is wrong in itself, or which, while indifferent per se, gives offense to the weak consciences of others, is to antagonize the spirit of Christ. Wilfully, deliberately, persistently to do that which offends the sense of righteousness or hinders the spiritual weal of any, is to part company with him who "emptied himself" in the behalf of men. It is the part of those who follow him to lend a hand to every one that is toiling up the steep way. As for him who deliberately gives occasion of stumbling, "it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were thrown into the depths of the sea."

I. A Man may be an Offense to Himself; that is, he may lay stumbling-blocks in his own path.

A quick temper, a prejudice against truth or sound morals, an evil habit of any sort, may be an obstacle in a man's progress toward the higher life. He may thus

"stand in his own light" and be "his own worst enemy." It is such offenses that the Lord had in mind when he said, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out." The eye of Eve offended her when she looked upon the fruit of the tree and "saw that it was good." The eye of Achan offended him when he looked on the golden wedge and coveted it. The eye of Lot offended him when, seeing that the Valley of Jordan "was well watered," he proceeded to pitch his tent toward Sodom. If thou hast an envious eye, a wandering eye, a lascivious eye, pluck it out and cast it from thee; it were better for thee to go blind through life, than having two eyes to be cast into the fire of hell.

And the Lord continued, "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." The hand of Adam offended him when he took of the forbidden fruit and ate it. The hand of Judas offended him when he clutched the price of treachery. The hand of Cranmer offended him when he signed the recantation of his faith. "Burn, thou unworthy hand!" he cried, as the flames of martyrdom curled about him; "burn, thou unworthy hand that didst betray me!" This was in pursuance of the teaching of Jesus: "It is better for thee to enter into life with one hand, than having two hands to be cast into the fire of hell." Wherefore let no man place stones of stumbling in his own path, but rather "lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset him, that he may run with patience the race that is set before him."

II. The Followers of Christ may Offend those who are Without the Church.

Christians are a watched people. They are "com-passed by a great cloud of witnesses." The galleries are full of those who scrutinize their walk and conversation; wherefore, it is of the utmost importance that they should live circumspectly, lest they inadvertently mislead others.

They may do this by an assumption of overmuch righteousness. It is a serious mistake to give the impression that the Christian life is a monotonous routine of cross-bearing. To follow Christ is, indeed, a serious matter; but it is also the most delightful thing in the world. "At his right hand are pleasures forevermore." To serve him consistently is to enter into the peace which passeth all understanding.

Our Lord rebuked the Pharisees for "binding heavy burdens and grievous to be borne," for making the Sabbath intolerable by unnecessary exactions, and for frowning upon innocent pleasure. A similar charge is made against the Puritans by one of our historians, who says, "The Puritans hated bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators." All this is who, when at the marriage in Cana, turned the water into wine, as if to indicate the blessed transformation of duty into pleasure which comes to all who rightly apprehend his interpretation of life. If God is our Father, if Christ has suffered for our salvation, if by faith we have entered into the glorious liberty of the children of God, why should we not make merry and rejoice in him? Tasks there are, great duties and heavy responsibilities; nevertheless his yoke is easy and his burden is light.

Christians not infrequently give offense, also, by the inconsistency. It is rumored that there are some whose names are on the church roll in good and regular standing, who do not pay their honest debts; some who are not strictly honest in business transactions; some whose word is not above question; some who obliterate the deep-drawn lines which separate between the world and the kingdom of Christ. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. In the reproof which Nathan addressed to David in the matter of Bathsheba, he said, "By the deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." In a like reproof which Paul addressed to the Roman Christians, he says, "Therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preachest that a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking of the law dishonorest thou God? For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you."

Deplorable Indifference

And Christians offend, also, by their apparent indifference to the danger of those who continue in sin. They profess to believe that the impenitent are under the doom of spiritual and eternal death; yet how often they utter no word of warning and lift no hand to rescue the perishing. The natural inference on the part of the unconverted friends is that they do not really believe the teaching of their Master as to the inevitable consequences of persistence in sin. It was only yesterday that in this city a fireman climbed to the roof of a burning building and let himself down at peril of his life to save a woman who was clinging to the cornice and crying for help. If Christians mean what they say, such heroism as that should be common among them. But when they refrain not only from strenuous effort, but even from uttering words of warning and entreaty, they place a stone of stumbling in the path of the impenitent, really as if they lifted up their voices to say "Peace, peace!" when there is no peace.

Nevertheless, when all is said with reference to Christian inconsistency, it remains that the impenitent are wholly without excuse; since the true example of God's grace is to be found not in Christians but in Christ himself. We do not set ourselves up as exemplars, but only as strugglers, doing their best, and quite imperfectly, attain to a holy life. But back of the church and back of all fallible believers, stands the Perfect One. The reasonable course is not to look askance at our broken lives, but rather to gaze on Him in whose life and character there was no guile. So long as Titian copied the works of Bellini and of Giorgione he was but an imitative artist; but when he gave up the imitative method and went out to study nature itself, the fields and mountains, the sunsets and floating clouds, he made himself immortal. Why should thinking people turn their eyes on men whose breath is in their nostrils when the truth incarnate is before them? Ecce Homo! Christ are all the graces of character and of the noblest life. Look to Jesus, chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely!

III. Those who do Not Believe in Christ are in constant danger of Offending his Little Ones.

So much is said about the inconsistencies of Christians that we are likely to overlook this side of the matter. Yet here was the special reference of Christ: "Woe unto the world because of offenses," that is, the stumbling-block which the world is ever placing before the feet of the weak and impressionable, the unsophisticated and unsuspecting. How tenderly and graciously he refers to them as his "little ones." He is very jealous of them and will not suffer them to be wronged with impunity. "Woe to him that offendeth them! It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were thrown into the midst of the sea, than that he offend one of my little ones."

Negative Hindrances

At the time when this admonition was given, the infant Church was just beginning to suffer from grievous persecution. Thanks to the influence of Christian civilization the era of sword and faggot has passed by. But those who inquire the way to Bethlehem must still face the finger of derision. In the case of many a man it requires more courage to stand before a burst of laughter than to march to battle in the face of an advancing foe.

The false teacher has much to answer for. It is not necessary to say, "I do not believe in God;" simply live as if there were no God and your lesson is taught. You need not say, "I have no faith in prayer," or "I doubt the inspiration of the Scriptures;" refrain from prayer and from reading your Bible, and others will take knowledge of it. You need not join the multitude who lead Christ to Calvary with shouts of "Crucify him! Crucify him!" hold yourself aloof from those who accept him as their Lord and Saviour, and your attitude will be perfectly clear. It is not necessary for

GOSPEL WORK AT THE PRESIDIO IN SAN FRANCISCO --- ITS OPPORTUNITIES AND LIMITATIONS

REV. S. R. WOOD

MISS H. E. LINCOLN

MRS. HUMPHREY

"MOTHER" LANE

CHAPLAIN C. C. BATEMAN

THE Presidio of San Francisco, Calif., is one of the largest military stations in the country, and possesses probably the poorest facilities for religious work of any.

A special correspondent of this journal has visited and examined the place, and writes the result of his observations: "The Presidio is situated just inside the Golden Gate on the San Francisco peninsula, and has been garrisoned continuously since Spanish times. The neighboring heights bristle with the heavy ordnance of coast artillery, while field artillery, cavalry and two full regiments of infantry, swell the permanent garrison strength to more than three thousand men.

"Through these gates a great army has passed and repassed since the beginning of the Spanish War. Here regiments have been organized, recruited or mustered out. Here troops land on their return from the Philippines, for a few days' or weeks' rest after the long voyage, and from the army dock troops are distributed far and wide. The General Hospital is a large establishment, capable of accommodating five hundred patients. The buildings of the General Hospital are conspicuous in the middle foreground of the accompanying photograph, near the right-hand corner.

"The building occupied by the Y. M. C. A. (formerly a boarding-house) is in charge of an earnest Secretary, Rev. Stephen R. Wood, who, with limited facilities and circumscribed quarters, battles valiantly as one against wind and tide, for the spiritual rescue of the soldiers. Very recently a large gymnasium, costing $40,000, has been opened by the army; but nothing has been done for many years to recognize the spiritual side of a soldier's life.

"On this large reservation there are three very small chapels, all exclusively used for Roman Catholic services, and apart from the Gospel Tent erected by 'Mother' Lane and Mrs. Humphrey, and maintained by them for the past two years wholly by voluntary subscription, the Protestants have absolutely no place of worship. The work within this humble tabernacle (the Gospel Tent), however, has been phenomenal.

Every night for two years, this small assembly-room has been warmed and lighted, and these devoted women have been in attendance to direct the singing and to be active in every good word and work, though keenly sensible to his limitations. His regiment, which saw much fighting, and performed a vast amount of manual labor in constructing roads in the Philippines, returned last January, and was given station in the infantry cantonment, where not a building exists suitable for a reading-room or chapel. But the chaplain is hoping for better things.

"It is said that the California Senators and Congressmen are primarily responsible for the barrenness of life at the Presidio, in that they have never exerted themselves to obtain adequate appropriations. The artillery and cavalry are fairly well housed, but the lot of the two regiments of infantry suffers much by comparison. In consequence, discontent among the infantrymen has been marked, and desertions are reported to have been numerous.

"There is always a demand for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is read with eager interest, alike by sailors and soldiers."

THE PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO -- THE GOLDEN GATE TO THE LEFT

conduct the prayer service when no chaplain or other minister was present to preach. Many soldiers have found peace with God through Christ at these services.

"Mother' Lane has been a well-known figure in Christian work at the Presidio for six years. Mrs. Humphrey has been her chief support for the past four years. Both are greatly beloved by all who know them and their work.

"Mrs. Lincoln, a deaconess of the Methodist Episcopal Church, gives her entire time to the sick of the General Hospital. She and Miss Elizabeth Rawles assist in the Sunday School for Protestant children, at the Y. M. C. A. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is interested in this Sunday School, as it has endeavored to support two little India orphans, Mrs. Lincoln and Miss Rawles aiding this noble undertaking.

"Protestant services are conducted in the dining-room of the General Hospital. One sees THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Red Letter Testament in daily use in the wards of the General Hospital. One thousand of these Testaments were distributed at one time to sick and convalescent soldiers here.

he who would destroy his neighbor's garden to break rough and tear up the fragrant plants; let him merely toss a handful of thistle-seed aloft and the wind will do the rest.

Unconscious Influence

In any case, the force of silent example is a savor of life unto life or death unto death. A farmer on his way from the house to the stable on a snowy morning hears a voice behind him calling, "I'm coming right along, papa," and looking back, he sees his little son tugging his little feet and carefully planting them in his footprints. Thus, no man liveth unto himself. Our children, our friends and neighbors, are coming "right along after us." See, therefore, that ye offend them not. A man may be willing to take his own chances in denying truth and living an unholy life, but let him understand well the fact that he is the centre of a coterie; at he is living or dying for others: that his children's children are coming after him.

But there is a positive side to all this. If by virtue of the silent, tremendous, self-propagating power of influence we are ever in danger of injuring others, by the same token we may be constantly doing good. It is for me to say whether my hand shall lay the stone in the path or be stretched forth to help. Blessed be God, there are multitudes of people who are unconsciously making their lives a blessing to all who witness them.

In our Museum of Art there is a picture by Gabriel Max called "The Last Token." A maiden stands in the arena, awaiting death for her devotion to Christ. On her left is a group of lions sated with flesh and unconcerned; on her right, a ravenous beast with eyes aflame is just issuing from its cage. The galleries are filled with eager spectators. At the feet of the young martyr a rose has fallen from above. She stands with her hand upon a pillar, and her eyes, soon to be closed on earthly scenes, is lifted to the balconies. They are searching for the hand that has dropped this token of kindness at her feet. Thank God, such simple deeds are possible to all.

Opportunities of Service

There are many about us whose temptations are greater than they can bear and whose burdens are breaking their hearts. O friends, lend a hand! Put yourselves into a position where your influence will tell.

Come over on the Lord's side and follow him, of whom it is written, "He went about doing good." Bind up the wounds of the man who has fallen on the Bloody Way; put the cup of cold water to thirsty lips; speak the word in due season, which is like apples of gold in baskets of silver. Live so well that you shall be blessing others without knowing it.

O the world is full of sighs,
Full of sad and weeping eyes;
Help your fallen brother rise,
While the days are going by!

The Proposed Rest Home in Chefoo

MORE information has come to hand respecting the project explained in this journal on April 6, of building a Missionary Home in North China. It is gratifying to learn that friends of missions the world over, are taking an interest in the enterprise, and are sending in funds for the erection of the home. It is remarkable how clearly prayer is being answered in the matter, for as each step is taken, and the need of money is laid before God, the funds necessary for that particular step are supplied. No sooner was the site chosen and the price arranged, than the money required was contributed. It is worthy of notice, too, that much of it came from persons who, either by their own experience or by observation, had become familiar with mission work in China. They, better than others, knew the urgent need of such a Home, and realized how much good it will accomplish.

The site, now bought and paid for, is near the Sanatorium of the China Inland Mission, and, in spite of the efforts of some scheming natives to prevent it, extends to the sea, thus securing bathing and boating facilities. Consul-General Fowler, who has taken a warm interest in the enterprise from the beginning, has seen to it that the title is secure, and has it duly stamped and sealed through the United States Consulate.

Mr. Gordon, an eminent architect of Toronto, having heard of the enterprise, has drawn the plans for the building, and has presented them to the trustees as his contribution to the work. They have been placed in the hands of a contractor, who has made an estimate of the cost at $12,000 in United States values. Persons familiar with building in that locality, regard the estimate as fair, and advise that it be accepted. The committee, however, have determined that there shall be no debt on the home, not even in mortgage, and therefore they are awaiting the receipt of funds before making final arrangements.

Dr. Hunter Corbett, of the Presbyterian Mission, who is chairman of the committee, and Rev. John A. Stooke, of the China Inland Mission, who is secretary, have written an eloquent letter to Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, thanking him most heartily for his contribution of $1,000, which has greatly encouraged them, and expressing the hope that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD also will be led to assist in the enterprise. At present there is $4,250 in the treasury toward the $12,000 needed for the building, and after that there will be the cost of furnishing. The committee pledge themselves to acknowledge all contributions through this journal, and to have the accounts, both receipts and expenditures duly audited.

The committee are fully convinced that when the Home is built and equipped, will be self supporting. A very small charge for accommodation and board, within the resources of the missionaries will suffice to cover all running expenses. At present, the missionary in China who is suffering from the effects of the climate which is very trying to Americans and Europeans, is obliged to undertake journey home, at a heavy cost both money and time. If he goes to Chefoo he finds there no accommodation but hotels intended for wealthy merchants, where the expenses are beyond his means. The China Inland Mission, has found that its Home at Chefoo has been the means of saving much loss and probably many valuable lives; but as it has seven hundred and fifty missionaries in the field, institution is nearly always full, and managers have often been reluctantly compelled to refuse to receive missionaries of other boards, whom, had it been possible, they would have been glad to welcome.

There can be no doubt that the erection of this undenominational Home will be a boon to these worthy, self-sacrificing men and women, and we most earnestly hope the funds will be contributed for its construction.

THE RUSSIAN AND HIS "IKON"

PORT ARTHUR to be saved by an Ikon," was the mystifying headline that confronted the newspaper-reading public recently. Few knew what it meant, and the text did not explain. To the Russian, the ikon (Greek eikon, an image), plays a most important part in the round of life.

A Russian family landing at Ellis Island,

RUSSIAN PRIEST BLESSING THE IKONS

without one or two or three ikons in the miscellaneous baggage, would probably be regarded as a curiosity. In the Russian interpretation of the term, an ikon is "a holy picture," that has been blessed by the priest, and is regarded with the same awe and reverence, and prized as highly as the talisman or fetich of the Arab. In every Russian home, the ikon has the place of honor. Half hidden in a wreath, or behind a crucifix, the "holy picture" is to the Russian family what the shrine is to the Italian.

With the frame removed, these pictures would not be very different from the images that are considered abhorrent by the Greek churchman, for many of them are fashioned of metal, and are really metal images framed as pictures. Some are beautifully done by metal-workers, and are really works of art. Others are ordinary pictures of the cheap variety, worth little intrinsically, but having been "blessed" by the priest, and so raised to the dignity of ikons, they are beyond price, in the estimation of their possessors.

The Russian churches in America are just now thronged at every service, by patriots praying for the success of the arms of the Czar. Two features of the worship would strike the American visitor as strange. One is that no chairs are provided for the worshippers; the other, that on walls, altar, and sometimes suspended from the ceiling, are pictures, large and small and on a variety of religious subjects, giving to the place the appearance of an art store of the kind where popular prices prevail, and the names of the pictures are not the first things criticized. The presence of the pictures is explained partly, by the fact that at many services the people carry pictures for the blessing of the priest. The pictures are sometimes carried away after being "blessed," and sometimes left hanging in the church until the family moves away, when they are removed to the new place of residence.

Just as Catholics are accused of being image worshippers, so the members of the Greek Church are accused of picture worship. To see the Russians walking up to the pictures of the Virgin in the church, or in the home, kissing them fervently, in token of love, and knocking their foreheads against them in token of submission, is to cause the onlooker to conclude that the picture itself is the object of worship. The defenders of the Greek Church worship, however, assert that the kissing of the picture is prompted by the same love that causes relatives of a deceased person to kiss her photograph. The ikon sent from St. Petersburg to Port Arthur to raise the spirits of the soldiers, has probably been kissed many thousand times over.

Every Russian regiment has its special ikon. The soldiers firmly believe that it will bring them good luck, and they will fight with much better spirits if the ikon is borne into battle with them, or carried aloft by the priest, as the regiment moves toward the firing zone. If he falls, the soldier dies contented, provided the ikon is brought to him that he may kiss it with his last breath. Should he be wounded and confined to hospital for a long period, his chief source of consolation during the tedious days of recovery, is an ikon. It may be merely a cheap four-by-five picture, but so long as it has been "blessed" by the priest, the ikon is regarded as an outward and visible aid to worship, and to deprive wounded soldier of his little picture, would be like taking from the Catholic warrior his crucifix. Should the soldier take a turn for the worse and die, the little picture that has comforted him during his life-time will be placed by the attendant on his breast, where the eyes could regard it if alive, and at the burial, the ikon will be left in the same position.

This proneness of the Russian to pin his faith on a picture, is defended by those who have traveled in the country and witnessed the services in the churches on the ground that if men of the mental calibre of the subjects of the Czar are left without visible aids to spirituality they will neglect religion altogether, be lost in theoretical distractions.

With his idea of the mystery of the religious life of the church crystallized in a picture, and that picture carried with him into battle, the Russian soldier believes he need have no care for the flying bullet or shrapnel. The Russian military authorities see to it that the religious ikon is always around with the proper guardian, in his place in the battle-line.

IKON IN A RUSSIAN CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA

IKON IN A RUSSIAN CHURCH IN AMERICA IN MEMORY OF THE "VARIAGS" HEROES

Bringing Thousands into the Kingdom

THE meetings conducted by Dr. R. A. Torrey and Mr. Charles Alexander in Great Britain, are producing a marked spiritual impression in every city in which they are held. Even the largest halls are too small to accommodate the enormous crowds which flock to them, and sometimes several overflow are held in nearby churches or halls. Many are conducted at these overflows.

Many of the upper classes are taking a practical interest in these matters. In nearly every place I have gone I have found the best people of the community in the very forefront of the meetings. Take Birmingham, for example. No name is better known than that of Mr. George Cadbury, whose generous treatment of his employees have won for him esteem and admiration. Mr. Cadbury is on the platform to welcome Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander when they reach Birmingham, and until the end of the meetings his sympathy and support were manifested in various directions. Among others closely identified with the work were Lord Overton in Glasgow, Sir W. Henderson in Aberdeen, and Lord Kinnaird in Dundee.

In the course of almost his first sermon in Dublin, Dr. Torrey said: "I have just received a postcard, in which one poor fellow writes, 'You don't believe in that old out-dated doctrine of hell, do you?' No, I do not believe in a doctrine of hell played out, but I believe in a doctrine of hell taught by the only One that ever came down from heaven to earth to teach men the truth. I believe the doctrine which was taught by Jesus Christ of Nazareth." Many reasons were brought to a fuller realization of the truth of the Bible through Dr. Torrey's preaching on the subject. In mid-day addresses on the subjects, "Why I believe the Bible to be the Word of God," "Did Jesus Christ rise from the dead," and "Infidelity, its cause, consequence and cure," covering a period of ten days, seemed to be the backbone of the mission. The daily newspapers printed full reports. One man cycled thirty miles to tell Dr. Torrey how eagerly the reports were received in his locality.

Many touching incidents of conversion occurred in the meetings in Dublin. A young fellow from Scotland was converted one night. He immediately wrote to his mother apprising her of what he had done, and asked her to send him the Bible that he used to throw out of his traveling bag every time she placed it there. He received from her a beautiful letter, saying that her heart was overflowing with joy at the step he had taken. The young man immediately arranged to go to the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, and took passage that same week, and he is now a student there, fitting himself for Christian work.

A letter from Dublin says: "At one of the afternoon meetings, you asked the mothers who had unsaved sons to sing the chorus, 'Oh Lord, send the power just now.' My boy was a backslider, and I wanted him brought back to the Lord, and so, as I sang the chorus, I believed the Lord would answer my prayer. That night I brought him to the meetings, and when Dr. Torrey asked those who would take Christ to stand up, without my saying anything to him, he just said to me, 'I will stand up to-night,' and he did, and went up to the front and confessed Christ. He is greatly changed since then, and is trying to bring others to the Lord.

As the result of the whole work, it is reported that over three thousand people professed conversion.

After a week's rest, Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander began won a soul, received an incentive to begin work for Christ by his encouraging words.

One of Alexander's hymns, "God is now willing, are you?" was wonderfully owned of God at Bristol. It was sung again and again, and it left an impression on the indifferent that they could not rid themselves of. I spoke to a man one night who said he was saved the night before, and his face looked it. He said he could not forget the words of the song:

If you refuse him, O what will you do?
God is now willing, are you?

One Sabbath morning, Mr. Alexander called for volunteers to distribute far and wide tens of thousands of cards on which were printed in red, "GET RIGHT WITH GOD." His call received a hearty response, and in the evening, when he asked how many of them were saved through reading that little card, seventeen arose.

At the close of the Bristol meetings it was found that 3,800 names had been banded in of those who had made a public profession of Christ. In consequence, those who had the work in charge, as well as the entire church who love to see the Lord's work prosper, are rejoicing greatly.

DR. TORREY ADDRESSING AN AUDIENCE OF FIVE THOUSAND CHILDREN, AT COLSTON HALL, BRISTOL, ENGLAND

and come for an official International Convention to modify the now uncertain rules of international law, of which much is officially recognized as a part of the common law by England and the United States. Congressman Bartholdt spoke of similar but unofficial conferences of officials. The Inter-Parliamentary Union, begun in Paris in 1888, in a voluntary meeting of thirty French legislators with ten members of the British Parliament, for the promotion of arbitration, whose membership has now grown to hundreds, and includes legislators of many European countries and of our own, who will hold their twelfth annual meeting this year at St. Louis. The sentiment of this Union was given in the words of a French member, "To make war as rare and as difficult as possible." "Our hearts are large enough," the same leader had said, "to love not only our own country but all humanity." Mr. Bartholdt then presented as the first practicable step for our country to take, viz.: the passage by Congress of the following pending resolution:

WHEREAS, enlightened public opinion and the spirit of republican institutions alike, demand that differences between nations should be adjudicated and settled in the same manner as disputes between individuals are adjudicated, namely, by the arbitrament of courts in accordance with recognized principles of law; and

WHEREAS, the Government of the United States has ways recognized the principle of international arbitration, and should therefore take the lead in a diplomatic effort to secure its universal application: Therefore, be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to invite the governments of the civilized nations to send representatives to an international conference, to be held at a time and place to be agreed upon by the several governments, and whose purpose it shall be to devise plans looking to the negotiation of arbitration treaties between the United States and the different nations, and also to discuss the advisability of, and, possible, agree upon a gradual reduction of armaments.

A still nearer step was that suggested by Hon. H. B. F. MacFarland, of Washington, D. C., who spoke from manifest knowledge of the sympathy of Secretary Hay and President Roosevelt with his proposal (the latter telegraphed his accord with the general purpose of the Conference later), namely, that treaties of arbitration with France and Great Britain might be made and ratified in next winter's short session of Conference if, by public meetings, letters and otherwise, the President and Congress should before December be assured that public opinion is ready for the next logical steps in the arbitration movement.

The Platform of the Conference expresses gratification that eleven nations—five of them ranking among the great Powers—have appeared before the Court at the Hague and submitted their controversies to its adjudication; it regards the increasing development of commercial communications between countries as tending to the advancement of universal peace. It urges all the people to give their influence to the adjudication by the Hague Tribunal of all disputes between nations substantially as in disputes between parties in civil cases. It appeals to all in diffusing such a righteous sentiment and feeling towards all classes, conditions and races of men, that international arbitration will be resorted to as the best means of securing international justice whenever diplomacy fails.

It urges our Government to take the initiative action in negotiating treaties with all nations, whereby they shall agree "to submit to arbitration by the permanent Court at the Hague all differences which they may fail to adjust by diplomatic negotiations." It favors the coming together of representatives of all nations, as an "International Advisory Congress."

The Superintendent of the International Reform Bureau of Washington, D. C. (your correspondent), was called upon to conclude the discussions of the Conference, by showing how the members of the Conference could inform and arouse public opinion and express it to the President and Senators and Congressmen, by petition, letter, telegram and deputation, with a view to carrying the next advance movements, the arbitration treaties contemplated for the next session of Congress, and the pending resolution looking to an International Advisory Conference or arbitration and gradual lessening of armaments.

Progress Toward Peace

“OUR hearts are large enough to love not only our own country but all humanity,” said a leading speaker at the Arbitration Conference recently held at Mohonk Lake. This was the key-note of the great gathering, which was the most distinguished that has ever assembled there to discuss subjects that are closely allied to the happiness and prosperity of the whole world.

Such gatherings as that at Mohonk afford a most effective answer to those pessimists who look hopelessly into the future and see nothing but despair. Each is a distinct step toward the goal which, in our Heavenly Father's own good time, the world some day will surely reach. Here and in Europe, Peace and Arbitration are making progress. Statesmen and people are slowly learning to recognize the folly and wickedness of war and the desirability of settling international disputes by arbitration. That our own country should be privileged to lead in this movement is a matter that should stir the heart of every true American.

Reduced to the briefest terms, the ultimate object of the Mohonk Conference may be stated as follows:

1. An International Tribunal (or Supreme Court of the Nations), for the hearing and adjudication of all international disputes that cannot be settled amicably between the disputants themselves.
2. An International Convention for the codification of international laws.
3. An International Advisory Board, to consider mutual interests and pave the way for necessary legislation concerning the same.
4. Treaties of Arbitration between all the great Powers.

Here is a programme worth working and praying for—a programme of reform so wide and far-reaching that its success, even in part, would be a cause for universal joy. It is demanded, as Judge Gray observed in his able address at Mohonk, “by the growing civilization of our time, the broader humanity, the more catholic spirit, which have brought to our side the most generous impulses and pious aspirations of the day in which we live.”

Onward, the Army of Peace! May God speed the day in which its triumph will be complete, and when all rulers, and cabinets, and statesmen, and diplomats will esteem the preservation of the world's peace and the promotion of its happiness and prosperity as the noblest service they can render to mankind.

The Long Vacation

THE schools will soon be closing, and the tired teachers and pupils are looking forward to some weeks of well-earned rest. Nobody who is in the least familiar with the requirements of schools in our day, doubts the necessity of a summer's break for the teacher, and few regret that the scholars, too, are set free for awhile from task-work and school discipline. A teacher, to the outside world, begins her work at nine in the morning and finishes it at three or four in the afternoon. But in reality she begins it when she arises from her bed, she awakens with the consciousness of it pressing upon her, she is at her desk in advance of her class, and remains long in the schoolroom after the children have joyously departed for the day. A faithful teacher is a very hard-worked person indeed, and deserves well of the community. She is impressing the young with noble ideals, holding them to diligent work, training them to be responsible and intelligent, and our thanks and love should follow her. Let none wish the teacher's summer holiday even one week briefer than it is here in the East, where it starts in June and closes in September.

Some mothers do question whether two or three months of play are needed by the children. Some urge, with no little show of reason, that too prolonged idleness is no advantage to the growing mind and body. These thoughtful parents say, and who can deny their wisdom, that when grammars and algebras are laid aside, it does no harm for a lad or lass to take up a nature-study, botany for example, or astronomy, while fathers contend that the boys are the better for having some share of manual labor in vacation, morning and evening duties on the farm, errands to run, something to do besides just to while away the time.

Every home must decide for itself about this; but we plead for plenty of holiday for boys and girls, leisure to fish, to build dams and bridges, to explore caves and picnic in the woods. The teacher must, if it can be managed, have a change of scene. Well for her if she may pack a few things in a suit-case, step aboard a slow steamer, and spend her vacation-weeks abroad.

Three or four young women combining and traveling together, may easily spend from eight to ten weeks, inclusive of the voyage both ways, in European travel, at a cost to each of something less than two hundred dollars. Four young women, a year ago, traveled through England and Wales, with no superfluous clothing, and with every comfort in the grip-sacks with which they sailed from New York.

Bread Upon the Waters

WORK done for God and humanity multiplies itself. We sow the seed, and lo! the Divine goodness blesses it with a double harvest. This has been illustrated in very striking ways in almost every benevolent and spiritual enterprise in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers have been engaged, and it constitutes one of the peculiar charms of work of this character. In the outcome, something is always superadded which makes the result both delightful and memorable. In India, our aid rendered to the sufferers during the great famine was followed by a spiritual awakening of such proportions that it surprised the missionaries. Similarly, the relief work in Shansi and Shensi, in northern China, had a marked effect in clearing the way for Gospel extension on a broader scale than before.

Consul-General McWade's report to the State Department relative to the relief work undertaken by our readers in Kwangsi Province, a year ago, shows that the same rich and abundant blessing has followed this charity also. As a result of the Consul-General's excellent arrangements, three relief expeditions loaded with food and conveyed by American naval vessels, were towed up the West River, and, with the co-operation of the missionaries, the famishing population of a large number of villages were reached and fed. Consul-General McWade warmly thanks the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for their munificent charity, “which knows no sect and no nationality,” and he adds that through that charity, “many thousands of human lives were saved.”

Since then, so the missionaries assure us, the homes and hearts of the people of Kwangsi have been open to the Gospel as never before. Truly, the bread cast upon the waters is returning, after many days, with bounteous blessing.

The St. Louis Exposition Again

FROM every side we hear gratifying reports of the good work done in connection with the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee. It is evident that the evil designs of wicked men have received a check, that vice, recently so unblushing in its brazen cupidity and shocking effrontery, is hiding its head for a time. Parents are on their guard, and young women arriving at the beautiful city are armed against danger by knowledge, and meet friends in the agents of the Travelers' Aid Committee so soon as they step off the train. Though much has been done, there is much to do, and to relax vigilance now would be a blunder, especially as this is the vacation season, when girls are at liberty to go on a trip in search of recreation, or when they wish to add to their stock of money by some extra work.

The headquarters of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee in New York, are at 96 Fifth Avenue, where Dr. Anna L. Brown, Secretary and Treasurer, will answer all inquiries, and furnish Travelers' Aid Identification Cards in quantities as they may be required.

Three Dollars for One

AT this season of the year, many enterprising publishers make special introductory propositions, entailing great financial sacrifice to themselves, with view to gaining for their publication admittance into new homes, confident that when, once fairly introduced, regular annual subscriptions will follow, and thus compensate them for the financial loss temporarily sustained.

Experience has demonstrated that it takes fully six months for a publication to do full justice to itself and therefore July 1 has been fixed upon as the date best adapted for Trial Subscriptions, because:

First. It brings these Trial Subscriptions to a termination on January 1, the time when people naturally determine on the papers they may wish to read during the coming year.

Second. The latter half of the year lends itself better to rich, special issues, and of course includes the Thanksgiving and the Christmas issues, either of which frequently is worth the price of a whole year subscription.

Third. A Trial Subscription at this season of the year usually proves decisive, as a subscriber whom the choicest issues of the year cannot hold, evidently does not want the paper, and his decision may be considered as final.

It is a good sign when a publisher has sufficient faith in the merits and drawing qualities of his publication to make him willing to entail upon himself heavy financial sacrifices in order to introduce his paper, by offering trial trips at a nominal figure, and the public, as a rule, appreciates the enterprise that puts within its easy reach, for perusal and examination, publications, which, but for the facility thus afforded, must have remained unknown to them.

Hence a publisher who adopts this liberal plan, finds his public already predisposed in favor of his publication, and, in the end, the venture is more than likely to prove a profitable venture to him, provided, of course, his paper is adapted to his public.

July 1 is near at hand, and this year we have a more liberal proposition than ever before. Having arranged with two other publications for a six months' trial trip at a greatly reduced price, we are enabled now to submit the following

The Beleaguered Port

AFTER the battle of Nanshan Hill, described in this journal last week, the Japanese forces were rapidly reinforced for the attack on Port Arthur. By June 10 they were reported to be within eight miles of the city. The Russian commander appears to have anticipated their approach and to have strengthened the defences on the land side. Intrenchments, fifteen feet deep, were dug and surmounted by heavy guns. Mines also had been laid at a considerable distance along the roads by which the Japanese were most likely to march, and other preparations were made for a stubborn defence. Repairs were pushed forward to the ships in the harbor, evidently with the intention of trying to save them in the event of the fall of the city. Three large vessels, one of which was the Czarevitch, were lying in the inner basin. The Chinese, who have been allowed to leave the port, came out in their junks, the number of two thousand. They report that the Japanese war vessels are shelling the port daily, and that on the land side the forces under Gen. Nogi have priest who had come to perform the ceremony. "It is several years since I saw him. He has changed, and he is no longer good to look upon. I will not marry him." She was told that if she did not marry him she must be deported, but that threat did not move her. "Yes," she said, "I will go back to my country. I no longer love him after looking upon him." She went back to the immigrants' quarters and the man went away disconsolate. It must have been a grievous disappointment to both. After the long journey through life, the Christian need never fear such an experience.

I shall behold thy face in righteousness. I shall be satisfied when I awake with beholding thy form (Ps. 17: 15, R. V.)

A Mother's Mistake

In a police court in Newark, N. J., the judge had a curious argument a few days ago with a woman, who was apparently an immigrant, unfamiliar with our modes of judicial procedure. Her son, sixteen years old, had been summoned for assaulting another boy. The case proceeded, and the prosecutrix described how her son had been set upon, and brutally beaten by the defend-track and wildly waving a red shirt. He brought his train to a standstill with such promptitude as to throw many of the passengers out of their seats. It was only just in time. The pilot of the engine, when it stopped, was on the edge of a washout twenty feet wide. A terrific storm had swept over the Berkshire hills a short time before, and a torrent of water had rushed down with a force that carried everything before it. The ballast under the track had been washed away, just beyond a sharp curve which prevented the engineer seeing the danger. The two boys, Stephen McCue, twelve years old, and Raymond Perdrizet, fourteen years old, both of Great Barrington, had seen the washout, and realizing how fearful might be the consequence, had given the signal that caused the train to stop. They had waded waist deep into the water, to reach a point at which they could be sure of being seen in time for the train to be stopped. The passengers made a collection for the boys, which realized twenty-seven dollars. This was an average of nine cents from each passenger. Considering how many of those passengers would have been killed if the boys had not given occupied a position from which, with their long-range guns, they can reach the city. Gen. Kouropatkin, with the Russian army, was at Liao Yang, awaiting reinforcements. He is unable, with the force at his command, to cut his way through for the relief of Port Arthur. Gen. Stackelberg, also, who made the attempt, was repulsed with heavy loss. It is the general impression, even in Russia, that Port Arthur must fall, but it is expected that it will be heavily bombarded by sea and land before the final assault is made. The blow will be a heavy one for Russia, especially if, with the port, she should lose the vessels now lying in the harbor. The humiliations she has suffered at the hands of the brave Japanese nation which has proved her superior in strategy as well as in fighting capacity, both by land and sea, must make her wish that she had taken the advice of the wise king:

Do not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbor hath put thee to shame (Prov. 25: 8).

Bride Disappointed

Among the immigrants who arrived in New York on June 4, was an Armenian girl, of singularly attractive appearance. She was very gay for, as she told the Immigration Commissioner, she had come to be married, and her lover would meet her for the purpose. As the law is very stringent in these cases, she was requested to give his name and address. She did so, and he was sent for. When he arrived at the Island, the girl was disappointed. She looked at him critically and shook her head. "I like him not," she said to the Armenian agent. The defendant's mother was voluble with the other side of the case, contending that her son was not the aggressor, and alleging strong provocation. In the course of the argument, the judge addressed a question to the youth with her, who had been silent while his mother had been pleading. The boy replied that he had not touched the other boy, and the judge reminded him that his mother had admitted the assault. The mother replied that the youth with her was not the defendant, but his brother. The defendant was at work, and she had brought his brother, thinking he would do as well. The judge tried to make her understand, and reminded her that he might have to send the defendant to prison. "His brother here would do anything for him," said the mother, and the youth confirmed her. The judge would waste no more time in argument, but told her peremptorily to go and fetch the defendant to court, for he would not be satisfied with a substitute. Evidently there must be a strong affection between the brothers, but it could not avail in a human court. Happily for us, at the bar of God, our Divine Substitute is sure of acceptance.

He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them (Heb. 7: 25).

Boys Save a Train

A train on which there were three hundred passengers was saved from wreck on June 8, by the efforts of two boys. The New York Express was approaching Great Barrington, Mass., at a high rate of speed, when the engineer noticed the two boys standing on the the signal, the reward was not very munificent. As a rule people place a much higher estimate than that on their lives, though they often act as if they set no value on their souls.

They made light of it and went their ways, one to his farm another to his merchandise (Matt. 22: 5).

BRIEF NOTES

A branch of the Naval Young Men's Christian Association has been opened at Pensacola, Fla., for the men of the squadron during their several weeks' visit to that port.

Successful evangelistic meetings have recently been conducted in Joplin, Mo., the two Presbyterian Churches of the city uniting under the leadership of the Rev. Claus Olandt.

An effort is being made by the Baptist Church to raise an endowment fund of $500,000 within five years, with which to educate a native ministry in foreign lands. This is the wisest scheme in missions ever projected.

A tract of 170 acres of land has been purchased near Jamaica, L. I., for a Jewish colony. It will be divided into 2,400 building lots, and will be sold to Jewish settlers on the instalment plan. The plot cost $200,000.

The American Sunday School Union's record for the fiscal year is 2,542 new Bible schools established; 9,724 conversions have been reported in these schools, and those previously established by the society; and 133 churches have developed from schools organized by the Union.

Dr. Amory H. Bradford, of Montclair, N. J., in a recent address, stated that Henry Ward Beecher had in his possession, during his unhappy trial, documentary evidence which would have completely vindicated him, but refrained from producing it on high moral grounds.

Dr. Winfield Ayres, of the New York Post-Graduate Hospital, has announced the discovery of a cure for Bright's disease, which has hitherto been regarded as incurable. He has already effected a cure in forty-three cases, in which the disease was treated in its early stages.

A PICTURE OF LIFE IN THE SLUMS AMONG THE CHILDREN OF THE POOR

SOMETIMES we are asked if the pictures of life in the city slums are not overdrawn, and at others we are reminded that there are a great many advantages given freely to the poor by the city government.

The answer to the query is, No; it would be impossible to exaggerate the conditions of poverty and misery one encounters in some localities in New York, and although the city does a good work in making life less miserable for the very poor, there are still thousands of women and children who cannot take advantage of public parks, recreation grounds and other fresh air charities.

One instance will suffice to illustrate: Down in the lower part of New York, not far from Trinity Church, is a narrow street, but two blocks long, where poverty and wretchedness dwell in the miserable tenements which line this wretched thoroughfare. Here crowds of poor little children swarm the sidewalks and overflow into the gutters, it is the only bit of out-of-doors within their reach. In one of the wretched houses lives a woman with three children, one less than a year old. The mother is not very strong, and makes her living by scrubbing and cleaning offices in the tall business buildings nearby. Three dollars and a-half per week is all she can earn, for this work must be done before and after business hours. From this slender wage, eight dollars must be paid every month to the landlord for a room up three flights of dirty, rickety stairs, where the family lives. This leaves but a small sum for food and clothing. No wonder the little ones are hungry and ragged.

At four o'clock, one hot, stifling afternoon last week, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's representative succeeded in finding Mrs. Sherman's home, if such a place can be called home. The search had been a weary one, for the street is obscure, and is almost lost amid the crush and roar of down-town traffic. On the steps of an unoccupied store were grouped fifteen or twenty women, poor weary souls.

To be sure they were dragged as to dress, and uncombed as to hair, and some of them were barefooted, but almost without exception each woman held a baby in her arms.

These poor mothers had left their sweltering tenements to catch what fresh air they might and were taking as good care as they knew how of the little ones held to their breasts, and of the other children sitting on the sidewalks, or wandering about from one spot to another, as children will, who have nothing to interest them and nothing to do.

An inquiry about Mrs. Sherman, elicited a response from a hard-featured woman, but with a kindly eye, to the effect that Mrs. Sherman lived a "bit down the street" and she, the speaker, would be willing to "show the lady the way."

"These be her childer, 'ma'am," she said, as a little girl, with the blackest of hair and eyes came up, dragging by the hand a shy boy, smaller than herself, "and I am mindin', Down the street went the little procession, the woman with the baby leading, then THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative, then came the brother and sister "Mollie" and "Dewey," hand-in-hand. Pausing at the door, the woman turned, saying: "Here, Mollie,

"She's not very well, ma'am," said she, "she's a good woman, and has worked hers a'most to death."

And the sick woman was so patient a hopeful. "I'm sure, I'll get well," she said "I'm not so very bad, you see;" although I short, panting breath (she had just climbed the three flights of stairs after finishing her work), told only too plainly that her neighbor's words were true.

"I sometimes have to climb ten and eleven flights of stairs to reach some offices, that get to after the elevator stops running, it is harder than the work; but I am glad to have the work, for ever since John was hurt and had to go to the hospital, I've had to work harder than ever, but he was a good man, and I'll work for him when he comes home, for they say he'll never be able to do much any more, but"—and here her dark eyes shone with a light of trust and faith—"there is nothing too hard for God to do."

When asked if she could not rest awhile she had but the baby to care for, she said she could, as she had a chance for a few days, but there was no room for Mollie and "Dewey." "His name ain't really Dewey," she explained, "but he was born Dewey Day, and we always call him that, and the shy little boy hid his face in the folds of his mother's dress, for the children had come up—the baby in panting Mollie's arms; how could they stay downstairs when a lady was visiting mamma?"

When Mrs. Sherman was told of Mont-Lawn, and that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would take care of her children for ten days her gratitude was really piteous. The children did not know what it all meant, but were sure it must be something very nice, for mamma and the "neighbor woman" seemed so glad; and as Mollie looked up into the visitor's face, her black eyes shining, a "Dewey" peeped out from the folds of his mother's skirt, showing his little, white, even teeth in an appreciative smile, the visitor thought, "Thank God for Mont-Lawn, and the good it accomplishes for such as these."

This is but a very imperfect sketch of the conditions in which many poor children of New York City live; the half is not told, what was seen in this brief visit. The great crying need of such charities as that extended by Mont-Lawn, through the generosity of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is seen on every hand, as one makes a tour of even the shortest street in certain localities where the wretched poor are huddled, but where mother-love is often as strong as that watching over the daintiest lace-trimmed crib.

Three dollars means a ten-days' outing for Mont-Lawn for Mollie, and another three dollars gives the same to "Dewey." Twenty-one dollars endows a Mont-Lawn cot for the whole season.

TYPICAL DWELLERS IN THE NEW YORK TENEMENTS

them," continued the woman, "while their mother does the bit of work. Poor thing! she's not well at all, an' she's havin' a hard time. Yes, this is her baby, ain't he a darlin'?" And the baby was held up for admiration, poor little mite, he was "a darlin'."

take the baby, and mind you take good care of him until I get back; and you Dewey, you stay with Mollie." Then up three long, crazy flights of stairs the two women climbed; poverty, misery and dirt on all the landings. On the top floor, the woman leading, paused.

A Sunday Proposal Binding

JUDGE A. S. SWARTZ, of Norristown, Pa., has achieved a certain degree of fame somewhat unexpectedly, by a decision which he rendered holding that a promise of marriage made on Sunday cannot be evaded as not wholly binding when the person who made the promise, by his subsequent acts, recognizes the contract as existing. The case was that of a Lutheran pastor, who entered a demurrer in a suit filed by a lady of Allentown, who sought to recover for breach of promise. Judge Swartz's opinion, which is of general interest, is as follows:

"The plaintiff's statement sets out a solemn engagement between defendant and plaintiff on Christmas Day, 1898. She further alleges that the defendant solemnly promised that he would marry her some time in the month of June, 1903, and that such promise was made in September, 1902, and that both she and the defendant then and there mutually promised to marry each other, and that the said defendant, in consideration of plaintiff's promise, entered into his engagement of marriage. She also alleges that the defendant presented her with an engagement ring. The demurrer raises the question whether the contract is binding because made on Sunday, the 25th of December, 1898. If this Sunday promise were the sole contract in the case, it would be necessary to pass upon the validity of a promise of marriage made on Sunday. But this is not the fact, according to the statement. Even if both promises were made on Sunday, the defendant, by his subsequent acts and conduct, recognized the contract as an existing one. This is sufficient to sustain her action. The fact that a contract of marriage was made on Sunday, cannot avail the defendant where there is evidence of its subsequent recognition by him. Giving and accepting the engagement ring is a clear recognition of an existing contract to marry."

Mothers and Daughters of Japan

WRITING from Kyoto, Japan, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Miss Florence Learned, missionary of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions, says:

"The work everywhere is most encouraging, the only drawback being that of work and means. I wish you could all see the courage and the needs as we do who are here. Would that we all were as zealous as the women of Japan, whose husbands are sons go to fight for their country."

"There is an old-time custom in evidence again. It is believed that the soldier wears a girdle in which are a thousand stitches sewed in by a thousand women, will be protected from harm. The wife or mother sews in a stitch, and gets the relatives and friends to each add one, and then stands on the street asking each woman passing by to put in a stitch, until one thousand have each taken a stitch in that girdle, which becomes the warder away of all harm from the loved one."

"In January we had a touching experience the death of one of our Sunday School children, a little girl about ten years old. She had taken a cold, which soon ran into pneumonia. We had not known that she was sick even when a messenger came to announce her death, and ask if we would come and conduct a Christian funeral service at the house. The family were Buddhist; but the little girl had been so devoted to the Sunday School, and impressed by what she had learned there, that even in her delirium, she talked of the plan and the teachers and of heaven, where she said she was going, and begged her mother to go and hear about Jesus, and they wish to have the burial service a Christian one for her sake, though they had never attended Christian service, and did not know what it was like. We gladly assented, and it was held accordingly."

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WOMEN AND SELF-SUPPORT

THOUSANDS of women are anxious either to support themselves, or to find some work to do at home which will bring in money. The married woman who wants to supplement the family income lives on the ranch in California, on the avenue in New York, in the fisherman's cottage at Nantucket, in the mountaineer's cabin in Tennessee. She is everywhere in evidence. She knows perfectly well that if only she has a chance she can earn something, and though it may not be very much, it will mean an immense amount to her, both in enlarging her ability to do for others, and in giving her the complete assurance of money in her purse. One young wife is anxious to help pay off a hampering mortgage on the farm. A mother desires pay for her daughter's lessons in music. A grown-up daughter who is keeping house for her father, and brothers, and sisters, her mother being dead, longs for a little more freedom, and has hours at her disposal which she might use to profit, if she could discover an opening to her talents. What nearly all these women lack is the quality initiative. They don't know what to do, or where to begin. It seems impossible for them to effect entrance anywhere.

Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden, has lately written a book, entitled, Women's Ways of Earning Money, and to most of those who are in a quandary on the subject it treats, it will prove a real friend indeed. In one extremely entertaining chapter, Mrs. Alden tells of odd and original ways in which women have found gold mines, so to speak, at their own doors. It reminds one of a brilliant lecture, "Acres of Diamonds," which some of us have heard delivered by a brilliant Baptist clergyman, who vouches for the authenticity of his illustrations.

If women mean to earn money they must not be afraid of hard work, nor ashamed of any work. A young woman wrote to this paper last week, and told she wanted to obtain a certain situation, but "I will not take a similar one near home," she added, "as I want my friends to suppose that I am going away on a visit for the summer." Nobody who tells and shows such false pride as this will ever make a success of anything she undertakes. She is not quite candid, and she will be fatally handicapped from the beginning of the race by her lack of simple candor.

Another important and indeed indispensable thing, is to know how to do what you attempt to do. The woman who would sell butter and eggs must know the secrets of the dairy and the poultry yard, understand the value of her products, and be within easy distance of a market. The woman who uses cats of a superior breed, or takes pet felines aboard while their owners travel abroad, must be a mistress of her line of business. The woman who does glove-cleaning or fine mending, must be neat and deft-handed. The woman who shops for out-of-town customers must have made a study of that complicated and very exacting line of work. In order to earn money, one must have fairly good health. Invalids and nervous sufferers will have too many interruptions. Strong, physical health is in itself a splendid capital which a woman should greatly prize, and for which she should strive. By working too strenuously over superfluous tasks, by staying up too late at night and abbreviating her hours of rest and sleep, and by eating improper food, many a woman loses health, and slips into the ranks of the half-well, or often, without any excuse except her strange wastefulness and want of thrift.

To the young girl who is thinking of her future, and planning to take up some congenial work, I would give this bit of practical advice. Don't stint your preparation. In these days the woman whose training is thorough, whose mind has been disciplined, and whose range of all-round knowledge is widest, will be the woman who succeeds. You cannot become a finely quipped teacher, or a nurse, or a good stenographer, or an artist, a photographer, a masseuse, a dressmaker, a kindergartner, a housekeeper; you cannot become anything worth the consideration of those who hire business and professional assistants, without preliminary hard work. Time spent on training is time well spent.

Summer Fruits for Winter's Store

The currant bushes, where the ruby fruit hangs in beaded beauty; the cherry trees, with their delicious load; the berries of every name, and the apples, plums, pears and quinces which, in turn, will enrich the orchards; the grapes in some future day to grace with purple clusters the trellised vines, all hold tempting possibilities out to the notable housekeeper. This catalogue is by no means complete, for it has not included the apricot and the peach, which are among the housekeeper's old and trustworthy standbys for the winter table. No house is well provisioned for the cold days that will follow summer and autumn unless it have on hand a bountiful supply of preserves of every description. Jellies, jams, preserves, canned fruit, marmalade, and sweet pickles, into the composition of which fruit often enters, are useful and healthful articles of diet for cold weather. Indeed, they seldom come amiss at any time. It takes a little trouble and forethought, and perhaps it may cost a little money, to stock

Little care we though the clouds roll by.
I'm never lonesome, by shore by sea,
Here is my comrade—watch Leo and me!

the pantry with these toothsome dainties, but they will save doctor's bills and illness later on.

Among the ways of earning money at home which some women have found profitable, this branch has not proven the least successful. In most small villages, matrons put up their own preserves, but in cities there are many women who have not had the requisite early training, or whose engagements do not permit them to enter into the mysteries of the preserving kettle. These ladies are often glad to purchase real home-made preserves from the makers. Some of the larger groceries carry in their stock luscious jellies and beautiful canned fruits, which come to them from country homes. There is an art in doing such things well, in picking the fruit at the right stage, in bringing it to perfection over the fire, in using the precise amount of sugar or spice, and in properly sealing the jars. Fruit in glass is much more attractive than in tin, which should very seldom be used. Certain forms of marmalade and jam, and the several fruit butters which are made by a process of long stewing and simmering, are well bestowed in earthen crocks. Nothing is nicer for breakfast than the apple butter of which Pennsylvania housewives know the secret. It is an indispensable article, once you have learned to like it.

For the children's school luncheon, sandwiches spread with fruit-jelly are appetizing, and afford an agreeable variety. Much oftener than we do, we should eat fruit with our meals. There are still housekeepers who feel that a dinner without pie is no dinner at all, and, here and there, on a breakfast table in the country, one is helped to a triangle of pie; but it must be confessed that dyspepsia is apt to flourish on this diet. Tough pie-crust is indigestible, and its opposite, the flaky kind of crust that melts in the mouth, is almost equally perilous to health and good looks. But nobody need be afraid to eat plenty of fruit, either in the natural state or when cooked with sugar and served in delicate syrup.

The Convalescent

WHEN a person has been very ill and turns the corner on the road that leads to recovery, those who have had experience know better than to expect a rapid improvement. After a serious attack of fever or any prostrating malady, nature takes her time to rally. You measure the forward progress by stages of a week, not of a day, and there is no use in having the least impatience, for convalescence is a thing that cannot be hurried.

Still an air of joy pervades a home when the doctor announces that the patient is out of danger. There has been so much strain, such anxiety, about the dear one—father, mother, husband, wife, or sweet child—who has been at death's door, that when the tension is over, one seems to walk on air. The man goes to business without a black shadow in the background, and a weight as of lead on his heart, and the affairs of life move on in the family circle as if timed to soft music. Sometimes we hardly knew how anxious we were, till the bound of the great relief made it real to us.

The temptation to let the convalescent overdo is very great. Visitors call, and possibly feel aggrieved if not permitted to enter the sick-room. Yet very often the invalid is too weak and has too little strength in reserve to enjoy even friendly calls, and the excitement of meeting others than the familiar home group should be spared. "I was deeply wounded," said a young woman, "that I was not permitted to go into the room of my dearest friend, when I was assured that she was getting well, and I knew she had seen a girl friend the day before."

The attitude that permits one to feel offended in such circumstances is a proof of weakness. The nurse in charge is the responsible person, and she must decide who may or may not step across the threshold of the guarded chamber. Convalescence has its fluctuations, and while one day may bring so much strength that several people may be entertained with safety, the next day may be one when the utmost quiet must prevail. No one who is sensible takes umbrage at a refusal to be admitted to any sick room.

When at last the ordeal is over, and the convalescent restored to health and activity, goes forth once more on the daily round, the joy should take some special form of thankfulness. Where God has blessed a household with ample means, a gift might appropriately be made to a hospital, or a rescue work, or a fresh air fund; some tangible token, thus showing that God's great goodness is recognized. If poverty be our lot, we are not debarred from making our thankoffering, though it may take the form of some personal service to another; some act of self-denial, or some loving deed that springs from the heart.

We ought never to let a signal mercy of our Lord pass by without owning it in some way more significant than mere words. As the violets will soon dot the borders of the woods, and the birds come back with their sweet songs, so our praises should spring, fragrant as flowers, melodious as song, in the path of our days.

A Word in Behalf of the Shawl

Queen Victoria, the good and great sovereign of England, used to keep on hand an endless supply of costly Indian shawls, one of which she always bestowed on a bride who was her personal friend. It was the Queen's favorite wedding gift. Shawls are not now in vogue, and one seldom sees them except as they are worn by old-fashioned elderly ladies, who do not feel compelled to conform to every caprice of the changing fashions. When grandmother was a girl, every woman relied upon a shawl as a most important part of her costume. These articles were of many varieties, from the fine soft shawl of plaided wool, which has not been superseded in comfort by the railway rug or golf cape of to-day, to the Paisley shawl, with its solid centre of black, red or white, and its deeply wrought border of quaint and intricate design, from the shawl of India, wrought by hand, with dim, rich colors melting into one another like a dream, and a design of arabesque or flower eloquently speaking of the Far East. These latter shawls were often cherished heirlooms handed down from mother to daughter, and originally costing anywhere from five hundred to a thousand or more dollars. Among the gentlewomen who read this page, there are those who cherish among their choicest possessions white crepe shawls, deeply embroidered, brought for them by loved ones from Eastern lands in the days when sailing vessels cleaved the ocean wave, and men brought home in the sea-chests garments rich and rare which women prized. The Chuddah shawl still holds its own as a wrap for the summer evening, and its price is anywhere from twenty to thirty dollars. It is of marvelous length and softness as well as lightness, and as warm as a shawl of coarser and greater weight.

A MOMENTOUS CHOICE

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE spirit of '76 in America, was the same as the spirit of 975 B.C., in Palestine, being based as that was, on a question of taxation. The lesson of "the Kingdom Divided," is therefore appropriate for the day before the Fourth of July, especially as we, too, have our Rehoboams and Jeroboams in public life.

The Prophet Shemaiah shall tell us how the Kingdom of Rehoboam came to be divided: "When King Solomon died, Rehoboam, his son, succeeded him, at twenty-one years of age. Solomon had been about the same age when he came into the Kingdom. But what a contrast in the start of these two young kings! Solomon asked advice of God, that he might rule righteously, and God gave him great wisdom and great riches as well. Rehoboam left God out altogether in his plans. He did not even counsel with me as God's prophet, but sought guidance of men, first of the upright old men, and then of the young men who were his evil companions. He certainly needed wisdom above his own when he took the throne, for a rebellion among the people seemed imminent. There was a man named Jeroboam, who had made King Solomon not a little trouble, by stirring up dissatisfaction among the people. He was a superintendent of workmen under appointment of King Solomon. He had been led by the prophet Ahijah, that there would some day be a division in the kingdom, and he would be ruler of ten of the tribes. His ambition became known to King Solomon, and Jeroboam fled to Egypt to escape punishment, and remained there until the death of Solomon, when he returned to Palestine. At once Jeroboam asserted himself by gathering the people of the northern tribes together, and bringing them into the presence of King Rehoboam, with the demand that he should make their taxes and civic burdens lighter than his father, King Solomon, had done.

I heard the king say in reply: 'Come to me again after three days, and I will give you an answer.' I did hope that it was his intention to seek counsel of the Lord. Instead of that, he first called the wise elders together, and counselled with them. They advised that he should promise to make these people's burdens lighter, and so win their loyalty, and make them his grateful servants forever. Then the king turned to his boon companions, young men like himself. They advised him to get everything out of the people that he could, and make them feel he was a king to be feared and obeyed. He chose from the first which advice he would take, for he was proud, and would want to exceed the splendor of his father, King Solomon. He had inherited a kingdom of considerable extent, and had a large income. The shields of his body-guard were of solid gold, as were also the table appointments of his palace. I knew the young man was too proud to be satisfied with anything less, even though it could be sustained only through the sacrifice of his subjects.

I watched him closely all those three days of grace he had asked. I did not once see him go aside to pray, as King David and King Solomon would have done. He did not even consult the thousands of wise proverbs that his father had written and collected especially for him, some of which were exceedingly pertinent in this emergency. He threw himself, instead, into wilder orgies with his young companions, avoiding any further consultation with the elders. At the end of the third day, Jeroboam and the people of the northern tribes again appeared before King Rehoboam, and his answer was defiantly given as follows: 'Whereas my father put on you a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke. My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.' I heard the groans of the people. I saw the look of grim determination settle on the face of Jeroboam as he addressed the people to their tents, which was virtually a declaration of war. The tribe of Judah refused to join the rebellion, and remained under the rule of Rehoboam, but the others rebelled and formed a new 'Kingdom of Israel.' Even when the revolt had begun, Rehoboam continued his blunders. A man hated above all others, Jeroboam, who was at the head of the idolatrous system, was sent, most unwisely, by King Rehoboam to demand the very taxes that had caused the revolt. We can not wonder whether his motive was to placate or to force the people, presumably the latter, for the people threatened him to death when he came to them. King Rehoboam was so alarmed by this result, that he fled to Shechem, where he had been crowned king, in the first haste, and fled to his stronghold at Jerusalem."

Illustration and Application

Old testament stories, which were written not so much for historical as for illustrative purposes, are of perpetual value, not only because they reveal the divine nature, showing the way in which a perfect God deals with imperfect men in a progressive religion, but also because they reveal human nature.

*International Sunday School Lesson on "The Kingdom Divided" for July 3, 1 Kings 12:12-20. Golden Text: "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall" Proverbs 16:18.

ture, which is essentially alike in all ages, so that a story like this of Rehoboam, serves as an old mirror of the folly and wickedness of the young man in every age, who rejects the Christian advice of wise elders, to follow, instead, the wicked and foolish advice of young companions, to his own great loss and that of others—in this case of his whole country. This gives us for our two related and ever timely themes, to-day, advice and choice.

I. ADVICE.—Be careful what advice you give. Be more careful what advice you take. Most of all, be careful what advice is given and taken, when it may turn the whole course of a young life, or of a whole nation.

II. CHOICE.—Remember that a moment's choice may influence not only a whole life, but an eternity; and not one life only, but many.

There has just come to light a most impressive parallel and contrast to the lesson story, so far as it relates to advice, in the published statement that Herbert Spencer, some years ago, advised one of the ruling spirits of Japan, that his coun-older classes may well consider on this "Independence Sunday," when, if we are citizens of the Kingdom of God, we shall not be kept by any narrow patriotism, from being also "citizens of the world," loyal to the brotherhood of man. It is a good time to remember the great word of a Japanese Christian, who said recently in a prayer meeting, "If all men are brothers, then this war of ours is a family quarrel." The whole nation, abstaining from the usual wild exultation of victors, rebukes Christian nations by its comparative freedom from "jingoism" and "militarism."

But the moral battles that are always at hand, especially when the Fourth of July is at hand, should have largest attention, especially in classes of young people—in classes of parents also, for the first word to be said about moral advice is to those who should give it. It is not enough to "give good advice." It should be given at the right time and in the right way. Advising must not become mere "nagging." Some mothers spoil their advice to both husband and child, who both need it, by pouring it over them in season and out of season, in public and private. Richter said he would have the name of God spoken to a child only in grand moments. Important advice also should be reserved for impressive hours. Usually it should be spoken softly, however earnestly, where no third party but God can hear. The subject of advice is particularly timely just now, when so many are coming back from general conferences and assemblies, bringing to Christians, young and old, in resolutions and otherwise, advice as to divorce, drink, the Lord's Day, gambling, amusements, and the like. In church and State alike, "law makes it easier to do right, and harder to do wrong." If inexperienced young people are to be left to "their own conscience" and their own ignorance in the translation of the Bible into ethics, they should be left to themselves in the translation of it into doctrines also, which would mean an anarchy of belief, like the anarchy of ethical practice we have in churches, which have no ethical "rules"—not even an authoritative statement of ethical "advice" to put into the hands of new members, sincerely wishing the guidance of more experienced Christians. Every church, as well as every home, we believe, should give its young folks not only advice but rules, for home and church should be schools of law, to train young citizens to the great art of obedience to authority.

Robert Burdette says to those who would measure the influence of advice on a boy, "Put your forefinger carefully into a pail of water, and then slowly draw it out, and see how much of an impression is left." There would be more of an impression if the advice were impressively given, and at a timely moment. And in home and church and school, there are many things that should not be put into rules, but rather into advice, as material for self-development, just as the best civil code leaves abundant room for voluntary action.

But even more important than giving advice, is receiving it, and this lesson itself, on the disastrous folly of Rehoboam, affords sufficient illustration of that. Note that the Golden Text, "Pride goeth before destruction," was one of four thousand-and-five proverbs that Rehoboam's wisest of fathers wrote especially for his guidance. Another equally pertinent was, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." It would be interesting to get a lively class at work a whole week, to find in the book of Proverbs other parental advice, that, if followed, would have saved Rehoboam the loss of so much of his kingdom, and the incessant wars that resulted from the secession of the ten tribes. All this trouble came from rejecting the wise advice of his father and his elders, and following, instead, the advice of his wicked young associates. He suffered for life and eternity, and his country has been perpetually harmed by that acceptance of bad advice, that rejection of good counsel.

But advice produces neither good nor ill, until the will takes it from the reason and puts it into practice. When timepieces usually bore mottoes, one had this impressive message for all who turned to it, "Hoc momento pendat eternitas."—On this moment hangs eternity. Those who say God cannot punish a man eternally for the wrong choice of a moment, forget the fact, which would be impossible also if their reasoning was sound, that in consequence of such a choice as Rehoboam's, not only will one suffer loss all his life, but his people also, for ages. In giving man freedom of the will, God gave him his own image, a quality given to nothing in mineral, vegetable, or animal kingdoms, but only to those in the Spiritual Kingdom. But with the will power to rise into likeness with God, there went necessarily the will power to fall. What a man suffers in the next world from a wrong choice, like what he suffers in this, is rather a consequence of his wilful sin, than a punishment from God. For example—at a later period than our lesson, the Syrians came against Jerusalem, and because Rehoboam had forfeited the favor of God, they carried away his shields of gold, and he was able thereafter to put in their place on the wall, only shields of brass. So by his own wilful sin, a young man loses his shields of gold, his virile purity.

THE FIRST PRAYER IN CONGRESS

try should be very careful not to repeat the experience of India, by letting the stronger white race get too much control of commercial and political life, which would inevitably result in the loss of native self-reliance, and so of independence. Leading English papers criticized him severely, but there are many white men in the British Empire, as well as elsewhere, who will frankly recognize that in giving such advice, he rose above national and race prejudices into a true humanitarianism, and they will see the vindication of his advice, which Japan has adopted, in the fact that for the first time in modern history, one of the tinted races is making successful resistance to the "land hunger" of the white races.

Such national and international bearings of the lesson, the

THE REVENGE of MISS NANCY

By GRANVILLE OSBORNE

NANCY SIMPSON stood in her back door, arms akimbo, watching the chickens pick up the corn which she had just scattered for them, with a liberal hand. The bright rays of the morning sun shone warmly down upon her face, somewhat softening its grim, austere lines, and causing a slight flush to tinge the sallow skin, drawn tightly over her high cheek-bones. "My sakes!" she said to herself, wiping her forehead, and stepping into the shade of the porch. "I b'leve it's goin' to be hotter to-day than yistiddy. I'll hev to get out my sun-bunnet, if it keeps on like this!"

The hens fluttered frantically about, greedily devouring the generous supply of grain that had been thrown to them.

They were a beautiful lot of fowls—a pure breed of Plymouth Rocks, with feathers delicately penciled, combs of a most vivid scarlet, and legs of that bright, clear yellow, which, to the fancier, is such a sure indication of a pure, healthy strain.

Nancy Simpson watched them with great pride and satisfaction, as they fought for the last kernel of corn.

"I shall take some of 'em to the county fair this year," she mused. "There ain't a finer lot of poultry in the hull State, let alone Bascom County. I shall certainly enter a few coops of 'em for the premium. If I don't get it, I'd like to know who will!" She glanced vindictively over her back fence into the next yard, where a brood of brown Leghorns clucked and cackled, blissfully unconscious of the jealousy they were exciting in the breast of the grim-visaged spinster next door.

"Them Joneses are a-tryin' to beat me at chicken raisin'," she thought bitterly. "I kin see that. All spring, she's ben a-watchin' my broods, an' when them fifteen chicks come off the nest last week, she went right away, and pulled down the curtain to her winders on the side next to mine, an' hain't had 'em up since. She needn't think she kin bother me in that way, for I never did fancy red hair, an' now I shan't see so much of it, thank goodness. But if I ever see that Jimmie of hers, throwin' stones at my Plymouth Rocks again, I'll—"

Nancy Simpson had long been known in Hagersville, the county seat, as the "breeder of fine poultry," as an advertisement in the Bascom County weekly read. In fact, her eggs and chickens constituted her main source of income, since the death of her mother ten years before. The old lady had left her the little cottage in which she lived, with a good, big yard and barn attached. It was from a nucleus of a half-dozen scrubby hens of no particular breed that Nancy began her poultry raising. Gradually she had weeded out the mongrels, until her strain of Plymouth Rocks was considered the finest in Bascom County.

All the spring it had pestered "the old maid," as she was popularly called by the townsfolk, to see a rival poultry establishment springing up in the next yard. The Joneses had not been in Hagersville very long—coming from nobody knew where. That they were desperately poor, the half dozen wretched, half-clad children would tell, even if it was not known all over town that Pete Jones, the sire, was more often drunk than sober. It was Mrs. Jones who had first found out that "chicken-raisin'" paid, and it was from the money earned at her washtub that she purchased the first half dozen brown Leghorn hens and rooster with which to begin business. She had tried to be friendly with "Mis' Simpson" at first, but made little progress, even before the rival chicken establishment was started. Mrs. Jones' brown Leghorns were of just as pure-blooded stock as Nancy Simpson's Plymouth Rocks, and it irritated that lady not a little to be obliged to confess this. That her rival was doing a good business, she knew, for many preferred the brown Leghorns even to her matchless Plymouth Rocks, because of their averred superiority as egg-producers.

Presently Mrs. Jones' family began to assume a more tidy and comfortable appearance, Jimmie strutting about in a new suit, and Katie parading up and down in a bright plaid gown, while the mother, attired in a new black bombazine, with green shawl and beflowered bonnet, astounded the residents of the little village by her changed appearance. Little Susie, the baby, was the only one of the family upon whom fortune did not seem to smile. Utterly neglected, dirty, ragged and unkempt, the little tot wandered around the yard, picking the weeds, and the few flowers that managed to grow amongst them, chasing the chickens with a long switch, peering with a dirt-begrimed face between the pickets of the fence into the next yard, and watching with big, fearful blue eyes, the tall, sun-bonneted figure that stalked about, never deigning to notice her little face pressed against the palings. Nancy Simpson never could bear children; but somehow the woman heart in her was at last stirred to pity by the sight of the ragged, distressed-looking little piece of humanity, who needed so sadly a mother's care and love.

Gradually little Susie grew bolder, and quite a friendship sprang up between the two, so that it came to be a regular thing for Nancy to lift the little tot over the fence in the morning, when she fed the hens, letting the dimpled, baby-hands reach into the basin with her, and scatter the yellow corn, "to ze boo-ful kikys."

Mrs. Jones resented the familiarity which had sprung up between "Susie and the old maid," and was not at all backward in expressing her disapproval of "such goin's on!"

"If you please, Mis' Simpson, I kin manage my children without any help from you, or anyone else!" she came to the fence to say, one morning, after Susie had been returned to her own yard, with her face washed, and her beautiful, silky, golden-brown hair curled in clustering ringlets beneath her dingy little blue sun-bonnet. "If my baby's face is dirty, that ain't none of your business, as I know of, an' I'll do the washin' of it myself, if you please!"

Nancy Simpson had made no reply to this tirade, except to say—"I can't bear to see an innocent child's face dirty, when soap is so cheap, an' water so plenty. Susie is as purty as a pink when her face is clean, an' her hair is like spun gold."

After that the irate mother took especial pains to keep the child indoors, and once, when she ran away and climbed through a loose paling into the next yard, was pursued by her angry parent, and cuffed and slapped all the way home, whereat Nancy Simpson's wrath was stirred within her, and her gray side-curls under her sun-bonnet trembled ominously. "I'll get even with that woman!" she exclaimed to the chickens—as there was nothing else to relieve her feelings upon—"yea, if it takes me ten years. It's enough to make any one's blood boil to see a baby like that abused. I'd like to —" Whatever she would like to do was left unexpressed, as was usually the fate of Nancy's threats.

As the time for the County Fair drew near, great excitement reigned in Bascom County. When the Bascom County weekly announced the prizes, rivalry grew keen, and interest deepened.

Nancy Simpson was gratified to read among the reports of premiums, that a special prize of one hundred dollars was offered for the best coop of fowls, the number being limited to a trio—a rooster and two hens.

"One hundred dollars! My sakes alive! That's a big premium!" she exclaimed. "I've never seen it above twenty-five dollars before. I shall try for it with a coop of my Plymouth Rocks. I wonder if Mis' Jones will send a coop of her brown Leghorns? Likely as not, she will—but I'll see that she don't win. You just wait!"

Mrs. Jones at that very moment was also reading the Bascom County weekly.

"Look a-here, Jimmie!" she exclaimed, pointing with a somewhat dirty finger at the interesting paragraph. "One—hundred—dollars! Do you see it? One—hundred—dollars—for the—best—coop of fowls exhibited! Why, that's more than your pa makes in a whole year! Now, if we kin get someone to make a coop for us, a fine one, you know, like they have—maybe it'll cost five dollars to do it—I'll try for that prize. It's worth tryin' for, the Lord knows, with six youngsters to feed and provide for—an' a good-for-nothin' man into the bargain."

Fair day drew near. Hagersville always did herself proud during this yearly fete, and this year everybody declared she was going to outdo all previous efforts. Nancy Simpson had already received several flattering notices in the paper, and smiled complacently to herself, as she read: "Our own estimable friend and neighbor, Miss Nancy Simpson, will prove a strong competitor in the poultry department. Bascom County cannot show up a better breed of fowls than her famous Plymouth Rocks!" Mrs. Jones also read this, and her face reddened in anger. "I wish that old maid an' her Plymouth Rocks was in Bungy! If it wasn't for her, I would stand a good show to win!"

She went outside and looked at her brown Leghorns. They were a beautiful lot of fowls, and the rooster, resplendent with gorgeous, golden plumage, and graceful, sweeping tail feathers, was really a more striking bird than the somewhat sober-colored Plymouth Rock in the next yard.

Nancy Simpson had already observed this fact, much to her chagrin and annoyance. She had a beautiful coop made, of white maple, with red cherry slats, fastened with silver headed nails. It cost her ten dollars, and was intended to set off her Plymouth Rocks to perfection.

Only two days before the opening of the Fair, she found her prize Plymouth Rock rooster dead on the floor of the hen-house, underneath his perch. His neck had been broken—but how, or by whom, she could not tell, until she found a woman's tell-tale footprint in the mud, beside the hen-house door.

The death of this fowl ruined her chances of winning the premium, she knew full well, for all the rest of her brood were too young to enter.

With bitterness in her heart, she thought of a dire vengeance on her neighbor's hens. It would be easy to mix some cornmeal together, with warm water, and a little rat poison sprinkled over the mass. It would be possible to slip the pan underneath the back fence unnoticed, and then, when the hens had eaten, to get it again without being observed. While this was passing through her mind, she saw a carriage standing at the door of her neighbor's house. She knew it well.

"It's Dr. Powell's buggy—wonder who is sick?" she thought.

A fear smote her heart. She remembered that Susie had not been at the window for several days. Going down to the gate, she waited until the doctor came out. "Good mornin', doctor!" she said. "Who's sick at Mis' Joneses?"

"It's the baby, Susie. A very bad case of scarlet fever! Luckily, all the others have had it. She is a frail child, and I am afraid cannot recover, as her mother is too careless to give the medicine properly, and is a poor nurse. It would be an act of neighborly kindness and Christian charity, Miss Simpson, if you could drop in once in awhile to see how things are going. Good morning to you!"

After he had driven away, Nancy Simpson took her rocking-chair and sat a long time on the porch, rocking—rocking—back and forth, thinking—thinking of so many things.

In her hand she held a well-worn brown, leather-covered volume, and she wiped her eyes often, for the tears hid the words she was trying to read: "Who-soever receiveth a little child in my name receiveth me, and whosoever shall humble himself as a little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."

Then she put on her sun-bonnet and went over to the next door and rapped. Mrs. Jones came to the door wiping her eyes, red with crying, on the corner of her apron. Not waiting for an invitation, Nancy stepped inside the doorway.

"I'm sorry Susie is sick, Mis' Jones. I've come over to help ye with the work. It's hard to hev sickness in the fambly, specially when it's a large one like yours. Now, I'm goin' to take off my sun-bunnet an' make myself at hum. You need to rest—I can see you're clean played out. Go right an' lay down, while I set wit Susie, an' give her her medicine!"

Mrs. Jones was so taken by surprise that she offered no protest; but, tired out with watching, did as her caller suggested.

That was but the beginning of Nancy Simpson's revenge. When Mrs. Jones woke up after a refreshing nap, "the old maid" still sat by Susie's bedside.

"I've been thinkin', Mis' Jones, that it 'ud be a pity not to use my new coop. I hed it made specially for my Plymouth Rocks, but my rooster died, an' so I shan't try for the premium. If Jimmie wants to use it, he kin put in two hens an' a rooster of your brown Leghorns, and maybe he'd win the prize!"

Again, Mrs. Jones made no protest. Jimmie brought the magnificent new coop over that very night, and the next morning, bright and early, a passing farmer was hailed on his way to the fair-ground—a friend of Nancy Simpson's, who took the coop of fowls and entered them for the prize in the name of "Jimmie Jones. Of course "The Brown Leghorns" won the first prize, and the hundred dollars did much, under Nancy Simpson's advice, toward making the Jones' home neat and comfortable.

Susie recovered, thanks to the careful nursing of her devoted admirer.

"You'd better let Susie come and live with me awhile, Mis' Jones," Nancy said one day after her charge was nearly well. "I'll do well by her. I'm all alone, an' somehow, I've come to love Susie. I ye think you kin spare her?"

The mother of Susie bowed her head on her hands and cried bitterly—not that she was unwilling to let one go from among her numerous flock, but because of a shameful confession that her husband had made.

"Mis' Simpson—I—I killed your Plymouth Rock rooster—I'm awful sorry an' ashamed—an' miserable—an' if you take my brown Leghorn—you kin have him—an'—welcome!"

"Lord, bless me! Who cares about a old rooster or two? Susie's well, an' I'm happy, so don't ye mind it at all. There, there," and she smoothed the head of the prostrate in contrition and shame on the table.

And when Susie went to live in the vine-covered cottage with Nancy, and run about the big yard with the Plymouth Rocks, Hagersville rubbed its eyes in astonishment, and remarked, "Well, ain't that the queerest old maid ye ever did see!"

ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE

By PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, F. R. A. S.

THIRD ARTICLE — JOSHUA'S APOSTROPHE TO THE SUN AND MOON — Joshua 10: 12, 13 and II. Sam. 1: 18

NO passage of Scripture, having an astronomical bearing, has received a discussion so immense and prolonged, as has the idea that God, at the command of Joshua, stopped the rotation of the earth on its axis. It is there stated that the story was an extract from the book of Jasher, and, therefore, not a statement from an inspired writer. Many similar extracts are found in the Bible, and in every book published and newspaper printed. Joseph said: "I have dreamed that the sun and moon and the eleven stars made obeisance." Does the Bible say he did? No; it simply says Joseph said so. It is in the Bible at Christ was a fellow, an impostor and a blasphemer, but does the Bible say he was? No; only that his accusers said

It is in the Bible that the sun and moon stood still, but does the Bible say it did? No; but that "the book of Jasher" said it did.

The book of Jasher says: "And he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow. Be- hold, it is written in the book of Jasher." The translators being unable to see what possible thing could be taught about a bow, except how to use it, so they translated a word "use" that meant "sing." The Revised Version uses it correctly, saying: "He taught them the song of the bow." We have had songs written on the steamboat, the locomotive and telegraph, etc.

In those days, it was customary to compare any extraordinary occurrence that was beyond explanation, to the sun standing still for an hour; but when any event transpired surpassing anything tradition or history mentioned, it was customary to compare it to the sun and moon standing still for a day. Here is the event which called it forth as the unheard-of series of vic- ries achieved by Joshua, with God's assistance, defeating the five kings and their combined armies. So some poet wrote a song, comparing it to the sun and moon standing still for a day, and published it in the poetical book of Jasher, an extract which was borrowed by Joshua, who, like an honest man, gave the book credit.

In ancient times, the Bible was not divided into verses, as we have it. What it says in the latter part of verse 13, does not enter into this discussion, for I am not whether they stood still for an hour, a day, or a week, the essence of the whole story is, did they stand still at all? My object in writing this is to convince others of the fallacy of disparaging the Bible, by con- sidering that Joshua does say the sun and moon stood still when he does not. Here is one place where infidelity claims to have achieved a victory, but in- fidelity and its deistic teach- ings are dead, as far as claiming triumph here is concerned. As- tronomy has come to the rescue and, without a telescope, has seen the downfall of infidelity and it is buried in the tomb.

Of course, the only way the sun and moon could be made to stand still, is to stop the rotation of the earth on its axis. Was there anything to demand it? The advocates allege that it was one near night, in order to pro- long the day. Joshua's last vic- tory had been achieved, and God assisted him by raining hail, which slew more than Joshua did slay. The advocates admit that God did perform the mir- cle of the hail, and at the same time accuse him of having made a mistake, and on seeing the mis- take, stopped the rotation of the earth — a great globe nearly 8,000 miles in diameter—instead of stopping the battle by the wave of his hand, and striking the armies blind or dead.

I wish the reader would pause a moment, and reflect on what disastrous consequences would result should the axial rotation of the earth cease. In my last article (No. 2), I spoke of the form of the earth as a spheroid, instead of a sphere, which resulted from its rotation when in a liquid condition, producing an expansion at the equator thirteen and one-fourth miles in thickness, thus making the earth's equatorial diameter twenty-six and one-half miles longer than its polar diameter. The waters of the oceans are rounded up there from the same cause. Should the earth's rotation cease, the piled-up equatorial waters would rush towards each pole in a stream nearly 25,000 miles wide, carrying death and destruction in its path. And when the rotation was resumed, the waters would return again to the equator. What a slan- der against the Creator, to accuse him of such widespread destruction of life when there was no cause for it.

The reader is reminded that the entire passage relating to the sun and moon standing still, is poetry, borrowed from a book of poetry, and we must consider it as poetry, often abounding in beautiful ideas, figurative expressions, choice imagery and rhyme, but seldom in facts of precision, of which the following beautiful stanza is a striking example:

There is no flock however watched or tended,
But one dead lamb is there,
There is no fireside howsoe'er defended,
But has one vacant chair

This is beautiful beyond ex- pression from Longfellow, yet there is not a word of truth in it. There are millions of flocks of sheep without a dead lamb, and millions of homes without a chair made vacant by death.

Now I will, for a moment only, assume that Joshua did com- mand the sun and moon to stand still, and that they obeyed him. I do so to prove from the Bible, that instead of his having done so near nightfall, to prolong the day, he must have done it in the morning, in the month of May, June, or July, and that the moon was in the western sky, of a gib- bous phase. I wish every reader could consult a good map on the Holy Land, to show that I am correct.

The first battle was fought at Gibeon, some five miles north of Jerusalem; the second at Beth- horon, northwest of Gibeon; the third at Azekoh, west of Gibeon, and the fourth and last at Mak- kedah, southwest of Gibeon, where the miracle of the hail was wrought.

Now I ask the reader to bear in mind that Gibeon was north of east of Joshua, and he says: "Sun, stand thou still upon (over) Gibeon, and thou, moon, over the valley (not the city) of Ajal- on," which is a valley on the eastern shore of the Mediterra- nean Sea, and west of Joshua, and Gibeon north of east where the sun rises during the three summer months. How could he command the sun to stand still over Gibeon, being east of him, and thus, as alleged, prolong the declining day at sunset? The record also says it stood still in mid-heaven, well up in the east- ern sky.

At first sight it seems as if Joshua had made a mistake in quoting poetry from Jasher, but at a second examination it has a different aspect. Gibeon was a large city, and had made peace with Joshua, which angered the king of Jerusalem, and he per- suaded four other kings to join him to punish the city, which Joshua prevented. Gibeon stood firm, which so pleased Joshua that he desired to honor the city, and he borrowed from the poem the famous apostrophe: "Sun, stand thou still over Gibeon."

Assimilate the Indian

In an address before the Baptist Ministers of New York, Col. C. R. Pratt, U. S. A., Superintendent of Carlisle Indian School, said: "Indian schools on reservations are weak and inefficient, because they are lacking in practical experience, association and competition. The Indian must be pushed into the actual life of the nation. Let the Indian be helped less from Washington and taught to use his own right arm."

From Many Mission Fields

Missionaries in Korea Busy and Hopeful

FOR only a year and a half preceding February 22 last, was I in the work of the Syen Chyun Station. Before that I had been in Seoul, to which place I have returned, because some of us had to leave Syen Chyun.

Syen Chyun, with its groups and rows of brown or yellow-thatched houses (you would call them huts), and before the war with its several thousand inhabitants, lies near the northwest coast of Korea, in a cozy valley, with hills and mountains distant and near. The main road from Eui-Ju to Seoul, more than 300 miles to the south, passes through Syen Chyun; so this town is a marching route for the army. The mission houses are a little off this road, almost against some of the hills, at one end of the town. When our company of missionaries had to be divided on Feb. 22, it was a sad day for both Koreans and Americans. Only five days before the men's class had been opened, and by Saturday evening nearly 500 names had been enrolled. A number had traveled many miles, and had to be told on Sunday to go home to their families, because it was known that troops were coming through, and that the class must close with that day's services.

For several days before, horses and oxen with loads, men and women with boxes and bundles on their backs, had been going out to country places; and the Christians who had not already gone, were advised by the missionaries to take away their wives and children. A note of March 18, from a missionary still in Syen Chyun, says: "There are many broken homes here these days, and the Koreans are longing for peaceful times again."

Of course, the Koreans are called upon to sell or give up much of their grain and other supplies for the use of the soldiers or horses passing through. The Korean officials who receive the price of the goods do not always hand it over to the persons to whom it belongs.

One day a great deal of "sool" (Korean liquor) was sold to the soldiers, which of course made them drunk. Next morning the missionaries and church officers met and considered together the evils and dangers of such sales, but were puzzled to find a remedy. The sympathy of some of the prominent citizens was aroused, and quite a body of men—foreigners, Christians and non-Christians—waited on the official in charge, and presented their case. The official was interested, and at once wrote a notice that anyone selling or even handling "sool" would be severely punished.

After the battle at Chyung Ju, the Syen Chyun people were for three hours momentarily expecting an encounter on their own soil, but were happily spared. The Christians at Kwak San had collected material for a church building, but lost their lumber in spite of all efforts to save it. They were paid for what was used for firewood, but the balance was destroyed on the retreat from Chyung Ju, when most of the village also was burned.

A note of April 23 says: "It is quiet here now. The hills are beginning to get green, a welcome sight. Couriers have carried frequent letters between Pyeng Yang and Syen Chyun, but the first pony load since the beginning of the war, sent to our missionaries there, left Pyeng Yang on April 12, accompanied with a permit from the Japanese Consul. Those who remained were glad to take over the provisions and supplies of those who left, as it was known that transportation would be difficult for an indefinite period."

Our programmes for women's classes were not carried out because of the war. Most of the women "search the Scriptures" with intelligence and earnestness. Some of the divisions are led by the missionaries, others by a Korean—one of the church officers. The class at Syen Chyun is usually the greatest convention of the year. Of course, we were all sorry that our plans were interfered with, but doubtless we needed to learn the lesson that our plans are not always necessary or the most important.

A class held at one of the out-stations, Nap Chun, in January, 1904, was a very great pleasure to me. These women had been eager to have the Bible-woman and myself make a visit to them, and right royally did they make our week's sojourn among them one to be remembered. Besides earnest women who knew the Lord as their saviour, were others who came in to see the "foreign woman," or to ask questions and learn more about the doctrine of Jesus. After one meeting closed, Kang Si (the Bible woman), and others of the women, had a special evangelistic service for the "strangers within the gates." One young woman particularly interested me. Her brother had been a believer, but gave up when his father died, and offered sacrifices. The mother and this girl can both read, and have been somewhat interested in the religion. The girl bought two books and wanted to believe. While she yet dreaded the opposition of her family, she was afraid not to believe. Most Korean girls have little opportunity for independence.

May the Lord's work prosper "in all places in his dominion." ESTHER LUCAS SHIELDS. Seoul, Korea, May 4.

Missionaries at Pyeng Yang Safe

Possible danger to the missionaries might have come from two sources. First, the rising of the Tone Haks—the Boxers of Korea—who were very active this winter, and whose avowed purpose is to put an end to all foreign invasion of the Hermit Kingdom; second, the coming of a foreign army. Especially did we dread the coming of Russian troops, and, of course, most of all, the coming of both armies to Pyeng Yang. Our community met several times to discuss the situation. Definite plans were made for the removal of women and children, and for the final leaving of the men when conditions made such movement necessary. But such conditions never came. With the Japanese victories at sea, and the coming of the Japanese army, the Tone Haks quieted down. Our danger from that source, for the present at least, is over.

There was a time when we expected a battle here. Talking with Japanese officers, I find they fully expected the same. But the battle did not come. The nearest it was on Sunday morning, February 28. Before daylight I was awakened by some noise. It stopped, then came again. Then I went to the door, and distinctly heard what I took to be the rattle of musketry. All grew quiet, and I went to bed again. Three Russian scouts had met five Japanese soldiers about a mile from the west gate of the city. They exchanged fire a few times, then each went his way in peace. These were the first shots exchanged by the troops, and the affair was reported as a battle. From that time the Japs have been pouring into Pyeng Yang, and passing on north.

At least 40,000 splendidly equipped troops have passed through. I doubt very much if an American army would have gone so quietly and caused so little trouble. Now there is only a garrison to guard the large stores gathered here. In passing north they have had several small encounters with the Russians.

Will these dangers come again? In case of a great Japanese defeat north, the field of battle likely will be Korea. With Japanese power destroyed, we would have reason to fear an uprising of the Tone Haks. At present we do not look for either to happen.

As to our work: on the direct line of march it was somewhat injured; in other places, scarcely at all. At one meeting we held, I never saw a more earnest group for a beginning. They brought out whole piles of fetich, in the shape of clothes dedicated to the evil spirits. Our work has not stopped, as some seem to think. But just now we need harder work, more careful work, and more of it than ever. Our need of help and reinforcements was never so great or imperative. I am glad and thankful to be able to say we are in no special danger now. May we not be sure of your continued prayers and help in bringing the Gospel to these needy people?

Chinese Treasure

"Can you help me? I want your assistance." The speaker was a quiet, unobtrusive, stolid-looking Chinese tailor, and the person addressed was a missionary.

A look of mystery mingled with anxiety, was depicted on the yellow-skinned face, as he stepped to a small cupboard, and brought out a little roll of blue cloth. Carefully unfolding it he produced six dollars, saying: "Yesterday, when it was mentioned that at this Centenary of the Bible Society, an opportunity would be given to show our appreciation of the blessings we have received from the Bible, I felt it would be impossible for me to show my gratitude. Last night I tried to thank the Lord for the unspeakable blessing the Book had been to me, and if I had ten times more I would gladly give it, in recognition of God's goodness. Will you help me by taking this small thankoffering, and sending it on to the Bible Society?" With a heart overflowing with wonder and joy at what grace had accomplished, the money was received. Just then the wife of the tailor entered, saying: "Will you please do me a favor, by sending on these four dollars to the Society, as a little token of gratitude for what the Gospel has done for us?"

A few minutes later the same worker was surrounded by a group of Mission School-children, who came bringing their ten-cent pieces—their only pocket-money for the year—and with beaming faces, said: "Teacher, please send this to where the Bibles are printed." The teacher's head was bowed, for the heart was too full to find expression in words.

The scene was changed. The missionary stood in a little Chinese blacksmith shop, where worked a young man of about thirty, earning a little over ten cents per day. Begrimed with soot and dirt, and perspiring

COFFEE CATARRH

An Unsuspected Cause

It is curious how many diseases come from a disordered nervous system which causes disease in some part of the body and the primary cause can often be traced to coffee which first breaks down the nervous system. A Georgian says: "There is no doubt coffee gave me renal catarrh. The cepthim in my nose was all gone and the catarrh was eating my way, getting hold of the main bone of my nose. It also affected my sight very much."

"My nose was constantly dripping bloody water but in two weeks time after I quit coffee and used Postum Food Coffee in its place, I could see my way very well, the dripping from my nose stopped and my nose finally got perfectly well and healthy as far as is possible for a cepthim to grow back."

"There is no doubt it was a case of coffee catarrh and it was ended entirely by changing from coffee to Postum. The rest of my family took up the new drink and Postum relieved my wife and little boy of frequent headaches and what is called 'coffee headache' is not known in our family any more. Our sleep is so much more refreshing."

"We have influenced many people to use Postum and all of them like it better than longer they use it and most of them say it is better than coffee." Name given to Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Ten days trial Postum in place of coffee often works wonders. There's a reason."

freely, he could not be called prepossessing; yet under that uninviting exterior there lay one of the Lord's most precious jewels. It was but recently that he had become an inquirer, and, desirous of being able to read the Word for himself, he spent his leisure moments in learning to read. Now he may be seen every week, with that courage which characterizes true Christians, shutting up his shop, hanging out the sign: "This is worship-day," and trudging to Church, with his Bible carefully folded in his handkerchief. Let me most cordially thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the $20 they have so kindly given by you for the support of our New Hebrides Mission. May our dear Lord Jesus abundantly reward and bless them and you with an ever deepening joy in himself, his salvation, and his service, till each of you gets his own promised welcome to the glory and unending joys of heaven.

The last mail from our islands shows that the work prospers at each of our mission stations, though now our natives have many temptations and hindrances by French and traders from other nations going and settling down among them, who allow them to have no rights in common with white men, but treat them with great tyranny and oppression, in taking from them by deception and force many of their plantations and much of their best land, and robbing them of the crops on them, on which they depend for food, and have shot one and threaten to shoot others if they give any opposition, and all they do the French men of war uphold them and oppress the natives, and they have no redress. Then the settlers complain that they cannot get cheap labor, and to supply it a number of ships of one kind and another are kidnapping the natives, and purchasing all they can from the heathen for rifles and ammunition, which the heathen only want to shoot each other, as they have no hunting. The natives so got they take away to other islands than their own, and sell them to the planters and settlers, who keep and work them as slaves, and they have no redress, no civilized nation having yet any protectorate over them. We report their grievances, but have almost no redress as yet.

Your letter, enclosing five dollars for the work, has arrived, after six weeks traveling. Though it still freezes with us at night, winter is going, and already two small schooners have arrived from the south, to buy seal fat and skins. They flit from harbor to harbor every time an offshore wind gives them a chance to reach another place of safety without being nipped. The people are now busy with their fishing boats and nets, getting ready for the fish which we hope are even now swimming towards our shores.

The hospital here has been open for a couple of months, but we are yet very bare of fittings. My first patient, an old lady of fifty-eight years, came sixty miles, hauled by her two sons and a team of dogs, to have her leg taken off. Have just seen her getting up, ready to go out. My second was a child with a broken thigh. The little fellow is now well again. One of my trips this winter was 300 miles with relays of dogs. On this trip I had forty-five sick folk, ending with a poor little cripple girl, still, thank God, in a curable stage. I have had 550 sick since Christmas. No Newfoundland. WILLIAM GRENFELL.

How Perdicaris was Captured

FROM A MISSIONARY CORRESPONDENT

TANGIER, MOROCCO, N. A., May 23, 1904.

ON the night of May 18, at ten o'clock, we heard the clatter of many horses' feet coming up the mountainside and passing swiftly by our home at full speed. Then a short time intervened, and another company of fifty mounted soldiers passed by at full speed. Later on, fifty soldiers on foot went running by, and at short intervals, small companies of Europeans, all well armed, rode up to the top of the mountain. All were going as fast as they could to the summer home of Mr. Perdicaris, which is located three miles from Tangier, on the mountain and near the sea.

At eight o'clock, when Mr. Perdicaris and his family were dining, the house was suddenly surrounded by a large number of armed men, who bound the servants, threatened, and ill-treated the ladies, cautioning them not to call for help. They then kidnapped Mr. Perdicaris and his stepson, Mr. Cromwell Varley, and made off with them. The band, which proved to be that of Raisuli and led by him in person, is reported to be over two hundred strong and well armed with Mauser rifles. The news that Raisuli and his band were at Mr. Perdicaris' mountain house was brought here by a native (as the telephone wire had been cut), and rapidly spread throughout the town. The United States Consul-General immediately demanded a force from the local authorities, and at once proceeded to the spot. Their hurried riding was the cause of the noise we heard on the mountainside when they swept by at full speed.

It was about 10 P.M. when Mr. Gummere, United States Consul-General, reached the mountain home of Mr. Perdicaris, only to find that the bandits had gone with their two captives into the more remote mountain regions, where they are now prisoners in the hands and at the mercy of their cruel captors. Raisuli left at the Perdicaris home a letter addressed to Sid Mohammed Torres, stating his terms. He stipulated at the outset that the Bashaw who has been searching for him for sometime should retire to Tangier at once, and that the troops should be withdrawn. Then, he added, negotiations for the release of the captives could be begun. Mr. Perdicaris being an American and his stepson an Englishman, the British and American representatives are pressing the Moorish Minister to secure the early release of the captives, Sid Mohammed Torres taking upon himself to carry out all measures necessary for this object.

All classes feel much sympathy for Mr. Perdicaris. His active part in public affairs, coupled with his liberal and genial disposition, having placed him prominently before the public for many years past.

We hear that three warships have been ordered to this port. It remains to be seen how things will turn out. There is much excitement all through the country again this summer. We are praying and trusting all will soon be adjusted for the best.

F. WEISS.

Raisuli's Demands Granted

As the cable has now brought the news that the Sultan of Morocco has acceded to the demands of Raisuli, the probability is that before this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers, Mr. Perdicaris and his son-in-law, Mr. Varley, will have been released. Raisuli demanded $55,000 in gold, personal freedom from taxation and immunity from arrest, the privilege of naming a new Governor for Tangier, and that Britain and the United States should guarantee the fulfillment of these pledges by the Sultan. To this last proposition our Government has given a prompt refusal, as to assent would be to countenance brigandage and blackmail.

FOOD FACTS

What an M. D. Learned

A prominent physician of Rome, Georgia, went through a food experience which he makes public:

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food and I also know from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients that the food is a wonderful builder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion and sick patients always gain just as I did in strength and weight very rapidly.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely and go to the mountains of this state, but two months there did not improve me; in fact I was not quite as well as when I left home. My food absolutely refused to sustain me and it became plain that I must change, then I began to use Grape-Nuts food and in two weeks I could walk a mile without the least fatigue and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers I consider it a duty to make these facts public." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Trial 10 days on Grape-Nuts when the regular food does not seem to sustain the body will work miracles.

"There's a reason."

Our New Gospel Battleship

She is the Little Missionary Steamer "Sunbeam," for Duty in Micronesian Waters

SOMETIME during the present month there will sail from Boston the latest addition to the Gospel fleet, which the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions has sent to Micronesia. This gallant little missionary vessel is now known as the Sunbeam, but later on will probably have her name changed to Morning Star No. 5, and thus become in name as well as in fact the fifth and latest of the most famous fleet of missionary vessels the world has known.

THE NEW MISSIONARY STEAMER, "SUNBEAM"

The Sunbeam is 140 feet over all, and thirty feet beam. Her net tonnage is 403. She has two masts, on which sail can be carried when necessary. Her average speed is ten knots an hour.

The little steamer was built four years ago. She is of wood with copper sheathing, and is stanch in every way. The Board paid $20,000 for her, barely the cost of her fittings, for she was elaborately furnished for the accommodation of observers of the International Yacht Races off Sandy Hook, last year.

Captain George F. Garland, who has commanded the Board's vessels in Micronesia for twenty years, is her master, and will sail her to her destination, accompanied by his wife, two children, and two women passengers. She will make her long journey via the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal. Her departure will be signalized by a Sunday School demonstration, for the Sunday Schools of the United States practically pay for the vessel.

Micronesia is the group of small islands just north of the Equator, 5,000 miles southwest of San Francisco, including the Marshall, Gilbert, Caroline and Ladrone Islands. Guam, in the Ladrone, belongs to the United States, the Gilberts to Great Britain, and the other groups to Germany. The Marshalls and Gilberts are low coral islands, producing little for the support of human life except the coconut and bread-fruit. On this account foreigners, accustomed to other modes of living, cannot reside there permanently. On the higher islands, the range of vegetable products is much greater, and therefore the mission schools are maintained there, the natives being brought from the other island groups to be taught. The missionaries use a seaworthy vessel of light draught to convey them and their pupils from island to island. Three years ago Morning Star No. 4 became unfit for service and was sold. Since then the missionaries have used two little schooners; but the results were unsatisfactory, and the purchase of the Sunbeam followed.

Justice Brewer on the Bible

IN the course of an able address to the students of the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York, a few days ago, at the Commencement Exercises, the Hon. David J. Brewer, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, paid an eloquent tribute to the value of the Bible and the work of all who are helping to extend its influence on the people. He said:

"A lawyer in the pulpit may seem out of place, but it occurs to me that if there were more Gospel on the bench, and perhaps more law in the pulpit it might be better for us all.

"No nation is better than its sacred Book. In that book are expressed its highest ideals of life, and no nation rises above those ideals.

"No nation has a sacred book to be compared with ours. This American nation, from its first settlement at Jamestown to the present hour, is based upon and permeated by the principles of the Bible.

"The more this Bible enters into our national life, the grander and purer and better will become that life. How shall this be done? One way is by circulating copies of the Bible. It would be a great blessing if a Bible could be put in the hands of every dweller in this country. If you put the Book as it is in every man's hand you have made more than a beginning.

"But there is something more than putting the Book into every man's hand. We have an illustration of what I mean in a political campaign. Orators and speakers are sent out to awaken enthusiasm and to get the people to read the documents that are distributed. It does not follow that if you put a book in a man's hand that he will read it. You have to do something to draw his attention to its value and impress upon him that there is in the book something which is for his country's good; so the sending out of teachers of the Bible, competent to explain and illustrate it, makes it potent as a force in the land. The one who is engaged in bringing this Bible to the people is a patriot.

"If it were possible for any organization or number of organizations so to take this Bible and send it through this land that its teachings and precepts could be brought home to the people, the results would be grander than all the victories won in all the wars since the beginning of time."

The Bible Teachers' Training School at the Commencement Exercises of which Justice Brewer made the above remarks, is now located on Lexington Avenue, at Forty-ninth Street, New York. Its president, Dr. Wilbert W. White, was able to report substantial progress during the year. There have been 212 students, of whom seventy have been in residence. They represent nineteen States and seven foreign countries. They belong to fifteen denominations. Full information as to studies, terms, etc., may be addressed to Dr. Wilbert W. White, 83 East Fifty-fifth street, New York.

Christian Work in Cuba

AT the close of the war with Spain, immediately after the raising of the blockade, the Rev. Alfred de Barritt, then pastor of the Congregational Church at Marshfield Hills, Mass., went to Havana for a vacation. While there, he found a wide field for Gospel work, and through the generosity of Christian friends, a building was engaged, and nightly services begun. Mr. de Barritt found a most energetic and consistent co-worker in Senorita Amanda, who was afterward in charge of an orphanage, in which she was aided by readers of this journal.

At the time the State Orphanage was closed in Cienfuegos, large numbers of children were left without suitable provision. Thirty of these were cared for by Mr. de Barritt, who afterwards found homes for them in the States. In addition to the regular church work of a pastor, Mr. de Barritt, at the request of the city council, acted as chaplain for unfortun-

nate women, many of whom were redeemed from a life of misery and sin. The young people of the church sung in the hospital and prison Sunday afternoons, and distributed literature in the Spanish language to people found in these institutions; but this part of the work is crippled, and has been from the beginning, by the lack of Christian literature in the native language. Spanish Bibles, Testaments and hymn books, are most eagerly sought. In the many meetings where Mr. de Barritt has spoken, often aided by the songs of the Cuban children, he has earnestly pleaded that Christian benevolence should be extended to Cuba.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM*

WHEN the two apostles, whose injunctions, on the subject of Christian citizenship are associated with the Topic, wrote their letters, it must have been difficult to see them. Little reason truly had Christians to honor the king that was then on the Roman throne. But the apostles did not wish their converts to be mixed up in rebellions and plots, or to do anything that might bring upon them the wrath of the government. They were to be law-abiding citizens, giving no occasion for blame or reproof. Following too literally their instructions, which belonged to a different age and applied to different conditions, some modern Christians have believed it their duty to hold aloof from politics and make no effort to improve national policy. They were conscientious in that course, but it was detrimental to the nation. When good men refrain from exercising their rights, bad men have undisputed control, and the government is likely to have little of the righteousness which alone exalts a nation. For the sake of our beloved land, in fulfillment of the trust bequeathed to us by our fathers, and for the sake of our children, who have the right to expect us to defend their liberties, Christians are bound to do all in their power to purify and elevate the political conditions. It is true that the only way of having a Christian nation, is to have a nation of Christian people, but it is possible before reaching that ideal to have the policy of the nation conducted on Christian principles. It is in laboring toward this end that the Christian may do valuable service. If Christian men would unite, it would be possible to exert such an influence in the primary and in the State and National Conventions, that in our State legislatures and in Congress we should have men of high moral character, who would bring to the consideration of every problem an educated conscience as well as political sagacity. Not that it could be expected that Christians would belong to one or other of the political parties. There are conscientious men in both, but it would be a distinct point gained, if, in each party, through the vote of the Christians in it, a bad nomination became impossible. It is now by no means uncommon in many States to hear that this or that legislator is open to a bribe. Yet the man was probably elected by the votes of men who would themselves scorn to receive money or office for the betrayal of a trust. Not until Christians do their duty in strenuously opposing improper nominations can we hope for greater purity in legislation.

We have a right, too, and it is our duty to study the problems which are now perplexing the nation and endeavor to solve them. The principles of Christ, intelligently applied, are the real means to that end. The distribution of wealth, the hostility of capital and labor, the condition of the colored race, the restoration of the criminal newly released from prison to a place in society and the provision for him of an opportunity to earn an honest livelihood, the eradication of the gambling evil, and the suppression of the dens of vice, are only a few of the problems that call for the wisdom and the earnest effort of the Christian citizen. We pray that Christ's kingdom may come and God's will be done on earth as it is in heaven, but not until we take hold of such problems and in Christ's name attempt their solution, will our prayer be answered.

The neglect of these duties, the attitude of complacency, the indifference of the Christian public, is largely responsible for the evils that afflict our nation. We have a right to boast of our national eminence and to rejoice in the gratifying recognition of it now being witnessed on every hand, but we are still far from an ideal condition. There is still much ground to be possessed; but we shall never reach a higher plane until men of sagacity and Christian principle will forget their own affairs for a time, and devote themselves to promoting the national welfare. In no country on earth is there so magnificent an opportunity, and in no country would success do so much for the moral benefit of the whole world.

National Ingratitude

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ISRAEL never rose to their high privilege of nearness to God; they lapsed into idolatry in Egypt. Then God brought them out of Egypt, and put them under law, and they made a golden calf to worship. Then, under Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, they fell to sin after sin, and yet, as soon as ever, by, as a people confessed their sin, and turned to him, he heard their cry, pardoned them, and delivered them out of the hands of their oppressors, whom he had permitted to punish them. But this people of God's choice, far from showing gratitude to God for all his love towards, and patience with them, came with a request which was the deepest insult to the father-heart of God, that they might have a king to reign over them, that they might be "like the nations." A spirit which is intolerant of the presence of God cries out for someone to come in between; someone who is not so holy. Those who are not prepared to break definitely and forever with sin, and themselves at home in a religion which does not not require them to have anything personally to do with God, but to have to take everything from a man, or professes to transact their business with God. Setting themselves free from God's rule, they come under man's rule. They have their desire to be "like the nations," for any religion in which priestcraft exists is like the heathen religions—is all outside, and does not require that man shall be born again of the Spirit of God, and be made a new creature in Christ Jesus.

Israel got her king, and became like the nations; she sinned, but she ceased from confessing her sin; the tabernacle was neglected (I. Chron. 13:3), and had not

God raised up David, the man after his own heart, to be king, Israel would have become altogether demoralized. David reigned, and brought back the people to God. Solomon began well. In answer to his prayer God gave him "a hearing heart" (R.V.), and wisdom beyond any other human being. He abounded also in riches and honor, and yet, through self-gratification, this wise man fell into grievous sin, and the kingdom, the chosen nation of Israel, became more and more a failure, and the last days of Solomon were days of judgment for his sin, and of humiliation. The man to whom all the earth had come to hear his wisdom, because of his fame "concerning the name of the Lord," fell into idolatry.

And now Solomon was dead, and the kingdom passed into the hands of his son, Rehoboam, who had no such wisdom as his father, and who came to the throne at a time when unrest and discontent were rife among the people. God had been angry with Solomon "because his heart was turned from the Lord, who had appeared to him twice" (I. Kings 3:5; 9:2), and declared to him that he would rend the kingdom from him, and give it to his servant, and that Solomon's son should have but one tribe, and he had sent the prophet Ahijah to meet Rehoboam, and to tell him how ten of the tribes should be given to him because of the idolatry of Israel (11:20-36). Solomon heard of this, and sought to kill Rehoboam, who escaped into Egypt. If Solomon knew of this, surely Rehoboam would know, too, and it would have been his wisdom to inquire of the Lord. But the poor young man followed the last ways of his father, and his heart was never really turned to God. In the crisis of his life he did not seek guidance from God, but from his friends.

Time is the most important thing in human life.—

RHEUMATISM Relieved Through the Feet

Don't Take Medicine, External Remedy Brings Quick Relief. Sent

FREE ON APPROVAL. TRY IT

We want everyone who has rheumatism to send us his or her name. We will send by return mail a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, the wonderful external remedy which has brought more comfort into the United States than any internal remedy ever made. If they give relief, send us One Dollar; if not, don't send us a cent—you decide.

Magic Foot Drafts are worn on the soles of the feet and relieve by absorbing the poisonous acids in the blood through the large pores. They relieve rheumatism in every part of the body. It must be evident to you that we couldn't afford to send the drafts on approval if they didn't relieve, even after everything else has failed.

Since I used the Drafts I walk without crutches. They do just what you claim.

ANNE LEE GUNN, Augusta, Ark.
I am much pleased with your cheap and simple remedy. I have found it to be just as you promised.

Questions & Answers

1. Q., Diamond Hill, R. I. 1. What reply should be made to one who says he should "like to see a Christian, for he had never seen one yet?" 2. Why do so many persons ask if it is right for Christians to dance and play cards? 3. When people say "they are saved," what do they mean?

1. He is a scoffer, and unworthy of attention. 2. They are probably encouraged to make such inquiries by seeing some professing Christian so lax in regard to improper amusements. 3. They simply mean that those people have taken Christ as a personal Saviour and have publicly confessed him before men. They are no longer in sin or under the law, but under grace, which miraculously transforms the sinner's nature, giving him strength to resist temptation and keeping him from falling back into sin.

G. F., New Canaan, Conn. Kindly give the origin of the expression "Before you can say Jack Robinson."

Grose, the famous antiquarian, says the phrase had its birth from a notable social personage of that name, who was extremely volatile, and used to pay flying visits to his friends, but was no sooner announced than he was off again. Another explanation of its origin is found in an old play (cited by Halliwell), in which the lines occur:

A worke it ys as easie to be done,
As tys to saye "Jacke! robys on."

G. W. D., Lakeside, Mich. What did Christ mean by telling Peter (John 13: 10) that he whose feet were washed was clean every whit?

The saying like the act was symbolical. A different word is used in the original to express the washing, in the phrase "he that is washed," from that in the other phrase about the washing of the feet. The former refers to the bath, or the washing of the entire body, while the latter refers to the rinsing of the feet, as of one who had soiled them in walking from the bath. The body having been washed, he was clean every whit, when the dirt subsequently collected on the feet was removed. The teaching is obvious. The Christian who falls into sin does not need another regeneration, but the cleansing of these later sins.

H. M. W., Baldwinville, Mass. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 18, 1904 (page 430), you state that John the beloved disciple died a natural death at Ephesus. Will you kindly write, or print in the next issue, what authority gives this account?

The date of his death is conjectural, but according to Lampe and other writers it was between A. D. 89 and A. D. 120. Jerome, Irenæus, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and others make mention of the closing days of John's life in Ephesus. Clement, of Alexandria, and Jerome, record anecdotes and incidents in connection with "the last acts of his life." In one of the Augustinian writings, it is related that John, when he felt death at hand, gave orders for the construction of his own sepulchre, and when it was finished he calmly lay down and died. Apart from these there is probably no existing record of ancient date. While tradition may be mingled with fact, in the older writers, the statement that John died a natural death at Ephesus has never been successfully challenged.

H. M. C., Elmer, Mo. Is there any authority scriptural or secular, for the statement that one of the apostles was crucified, head downward?

There is a tradition given by Origen, who wrote about the year 212, that Peter was so crucified. He says that being condemned to crucifixion by Nero, and deeming himself unworthy to suffer as did his Lord, he asked as a favor that he might be crucified head downward, and that it was granted.

Mrs. R. J. H. Kendola, W. Va. Do you not think that if the Japanese conquer the Russians, it will be a victory for paganism, as they, the Japanese, are idolatrous?

Japan has been much more tolerant of Christian missions than Russia, and the probabilities are that Gospel work in Manchuria would make better progress under Japanese than under Russian rule.

Daughter, Louisville, Ky. I contend that ladies now dress their hair much more sensibly than in former times. Am I not right? Can you give me any facts in proof?

The sixteenth century fashions are an illustration of your contention. Ladies of those times wore a wire frame on their heads curving outward from the sides, and often a yard high. The hair was trained to cover the frame, which was shaped like a balloon and was stuffed with horse-hair and sometimes with rags. It required so much skill and labor to fix it properly, that it was not taken down when the lady retired to rest, and people of small incomes would not disturb it for weeks because of the high fees the hair-dressers charged. The fashion led to serious uncleanliness.

N. H. E., Montclair, N. J. Your article relative to the measure lately introduced in the Iowa Legislature, providing for the appointment of a State Director of Marriage, and for instruction in and diplomas for Domestic Science, interested me greatly. Have I not seen a notice of books for this object recently, in your columns?

You probably refer to Earl's Housekeeping, a book of instruction in domestic accounting, published at 1223 Bible House, New York. Price 25 cents.

G. S. P., Harmony, Pa. Do the Scriptures teach that a soul once saved can afterwards be lost?

You are of course aware that this question has been the subject of debate between Calvinists and Arminians for many generations, and it is no nearer solution than at the beginning. We have on the one side the warning to watch and pray lest we enter into tempta-

Emerson said, in a passage which we cannot find, but the gist of which we quote from memory, that all prayers are answered, therefore we ought to be very careful for what we pray.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. Who was the first producer of cut glass?

No one knows. The ancient Egyptians were proficient in the art, as is proved by articles found in their tombs, which may now be seen in our museums. Rome received part of its tribute from Egypt in glass, and soon was able to rival Egypt in its manufacture. The art appears to have been lost for some centuries, but was revived early in the seventeenth century. Caspar Lehmann, of Prague, was the most famous leader in the craft, and is believed to have been the first modern to produce fine work.

L. E. S., Albany, N. Y. Who was the originator of the phrase, "Trust in God and keep your powder dry?"

It is commonly attributed to Oliver Cromwell. Blacker's Ballads of Ireland, contains a poem in which the phrase is used, and a footnote is appended, saying that on one occasion Cromwell addressed his troops on the bank them taken away after having paid considerable them. But I think that speculating in land, what might more properly be called gambling land options, is also one of the greatest sources of poverty.

J. A. I., Alderson, Ind. Ter. As we have repeatedly said, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not responsible for the views or opinions its individual contributors, no matter who they may be. There are occasions when it is not necessary that we should either endorse or disapprove of such views.

Methodist, Brooklyn, N. Y. Reading your report of the General Conference at Los Angeles am at a loss to understand why a man elected to so high an office as Bishop, should afterwards decline it, as Dr. Day did. Why was

There are many who feel the same difficulty in understanding it. The most intelligent satisfactory answer comes from a minister who was in Los Angeles at the time, I formed the opinion from Dr. Day's speech and from what he knew of the fact that Dr. Day was sincerely desirous of following the leading of the Holy Spirit in doing he did. His election was a mark of confidence and esteem, naturally welcome a gratifying to him after the bitter attacks made on him within and without the Conference, but, after it took place, he realized all that involved. God has blessed him so signally his difficult work at the university, and he made him so useful there that he hesitated leaving duties for which he is eminently adapted for a new sphere so different in character and requirements. He made it the subject of earnest prayer, and manfully obeyed the leading he received.

Reader, Buffalo. The marriage of first cousins though not illegal, is usually regarded as inadvisable on physiological grounds. The children of such unions are apt to be degenerate. Consanguinity, or blood relationship within certain degrees, is held by the Church of England to be impediment to marriage.

J. W. C., Arlington, Ia. I am an old, blind man and a little girl of twelve years is writing for me. With regard to the Peace Conference to be held in Boston, we can see, as did the prophets of old, though the world cries "peace," there is no peace. Peace was offered to the world, but the world would not have it and killed the Messenger of Peace. So we, who are the children of God, must not expect peace from the world, which is lost to trespass and sin. The world is merely trying to deceive God's people when it cries "Peace."

Golden Treasury for the Children of God, By Bogatzky

HERE is a book, of which millions of copies have been sold, and which has been a spiritual comfort to millions of people. It has been translated into nearly all European languages, and with the exception of The Pilgrim's Progress, no book outside of the Bible has been so largely circulated or so widely read.

This helpful volume contains 365 pages, or one for every day in the year, and each page contains a Scriptural text, a simple, spiritual exposition of the same, and a hymn of praise and encouragement. For daily use in a godly household at family worship, as a treasured daily monitor, and as a source of strength and wisdom, Bogatzky's Golden Treasury will be found invaluable.

Upon receipt of 25 Cents we will send the Golden Treasury for the Children of God, beautifully bound in white vellum and gold, all charges prepaid. There are 315 copies left, and only those who act promptly will be fortunate in securing one. Address to-day, tion: we have Paul's fear lest he himself should become a castaway, and the passage in Heb. 6: 4-6 and I. Peter 2: 20, implying the possibility of falling away. On the other hand, we have many assurances of the certainty of salvation to all who have once put their trust in Christ, and the statement that God never forsakes his children but will perfect the work he has begun. A more profitable use of the question is to draw from it the lesson of constant vigilance. Even if we are convinced that restoration for the believer is certain, and that he can never be finally lost, experience shows that he may fall into heinous sin, which will cost him bitter remorse, and perhaps bring reproach on Christ's cause.

Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa. Is it right to ask in prayer for definite blessings, or ought we simply to ask God to give us what he deems best?

There are many passages, such as John 16: 23, which warrant definiteness in prayer. Indeed, if a man needs something very badly, and is sure that it would be a blessing to him, he would show a lack of faith if he did not pray for it. There are many, however, who shrink from praying for definite blessings, after a painful experience. They have prayed for some blessing, and God has heard them, and granted their request, and it has proved to be a curse. We know one case of a man, so fully convinced that something he wanted was absolutely essential to his happiness, that he was very importunate, praying day and night for it for months. It was given to him, and before a month had passed he discovered that he would have been better without it, and from that day to this he has had reason to be sorry that God answered his prayer.

of a river, which they were afterwards to wade through. The Protector's address, as was usual in the Puritan army, was more of a sermon than a martial speech. His practical sense, however, showed itself in his concluding words, which were: "Put your trust in God, but be careful to keep your powder dry."

E. H. S., Evans Mills, N. Y. Am I right in inferring from Dr. Shannon's sermon in your issue of April 6, that spikenard is made from attar of roses?

No, Dr. Shannon simply showed by comparison, how costly perfumes might be. Spikenard is made from a plant of the Valeriana family, growing in India. It is extracted from shaggy stems or spikes, branching from the base of the plant, hence its name. A pound, which Mary used at once, would have been considered sufficient for many anointings.

Anxious Enquirer, Middletown, N. J. I am anxious to secure a situation. Will you kindly state in "Questions and Answers" some occupations for a young woman, and also a good business school in New York or Brooklyn where such occupations are taught?

Write to Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y. for prospectus, which will give all information necessary, regarding trades and occupations for women, also time required in learning, and cost of tuition.

New York Plunged in Sorrow

Nearly 1,000 Sunday School Excursionists Perish in a Steamboat Disaster---The Worst Calamity the Metropolis has Ever Known

JUNE 15 will long be remembered in New York as the darkest day of disaster the metropolis has ever known. Nothing in its history has ever occurred to equal in horror and suffering the holocaust in the pleasure steamer General Slocum, in which nearly 1,000 Sunday School excursionists, mostly women and children, perished in the flames or by drowning.

It was the summer outing of the members and friends of the Sunday School of St. Mark's Lutheran Church, on Sixth Street, which is usually a event of considerable social interest in that quarter of the populous East Side. At 8.30 a. m., the big, wooden three-decker steamed up to the recreation pier, at the foot of East Third Street, and then the others and children, with a sprinkling of young folks of both sexes, began to crowd the boat. There were comparatively few men, but the others and children kept coming in a steady stream, until some 1,500 souls in all were aboard. The Rev. G. C. F. Haas, pastor of the Lutheran church, was there with his wife and daughter, and his assistant, the Rev. J. S. Schultz, welcoming all comers. There were several policemen on hand to keep order. When the start of the pleasure-seekers was aboard, and the gang-planks were hauled in, Captain Van Schaick, commander of the Slocum, looked with fatherly interest over the great throng of women and babies. On the top-deck, a brass band was already filling the air with the popular melodies. All the decks were crowded, and when the steamer started, the band struck up "Eine Feste Burg" and "Unser Gott," and everybody settled down to anticipations of a delightful day.

This was about ten o'clock. It was an ideal day for boating, and there was nothing to mar the enjoyment of the multitude, who looked forward to a long, pleasant time at Locust Point on the Sound, the Slocum's destination. People on shore looked longingly after the excursionists, as they sailed on the gayly-decked steamer to the swelling music of the band.

When the big boat had reached a point in mid-channel, almost opposite 130th Street, something happened that was totally unexpected. From somewhere in the forward hold of the steamer—in the lamp-room, where kerosene, benzine and other inflammables were kept—there came a sudden puff of smoke. This was followed by a muffled explosion, and a sheet of flame. Men on passing boats and dredges saw the smoke bursting from the Slocum, just forward of the double smoke-stack. They suspected danger on the big boat and their steam whistles began to give forth shrill warnings.

shouted to them to keep quiet, they were wild with fear, and ran about hither and thither, vainly seeking a place of "shelter and safety." The screams of the women were now incessant, and mingled horribly with the roar and crackle of the conflagration forward, where the contents of the oil and store-room had added fuel to the flames. The fifteen hundred passengers swayed back and forth from side to side of all three decks like sheep in a panic. White-faced mothers held their babies tightly to their breasts, or feverishly clutched the arms of the little toddlers at their sides, as they dashed forward in blind eagerness to escape the awful death that now confronted them. Many grasped the rail and prepared to leap overboard, preferring rather to risk drowning than to await certain death by the fire. Repeated attempts to calm them failed. Reason had fled, and the multitude raged like mad beings. Frantic mothers who had been separated from their children, were pitiful in their vain attempts to find them. The boat was a pandemonium. Pastor Haas tried in vain to stem the tide of panic.

It needed but a few moments to convince the captain and his crew that the fire, whatever its origin, was not easily to be conquered, and it was decided to land the passengers quickly. The Slocum, still under full headway, was now opposite 135th Street, and the fresh breeze that came down the East River was fanning the flames into appalling fury. All the passengers were ordered to the rear of the boat, and the captain shouted to Pilot Van Wart at the wheel, to "beach her on North Brother Island." The island was still a good two miles off and the fire was momentarily threatening to engulf the entire boat.

With a crash, the starboard rail gave way under the pressure of the excited crowds, and in a moment several little children were forced overboard. A mother, frenzied at the sight of her darling struggling in the water, uttered a piercing scream and leaped after the child. Others, infected by her madness, sprang across the broken rail, and soon the foaming wake of the Slocum was dotted with human beings, surging and tossing in the waves and struggling for their lives. It was a

NEW YORK'S EXCURSION HORROR—MOURNERS CROWDING THE EAST SIDE STREETS

But still the Slocum went right ahead, never stopping, though Capt. Van Schaick and his crew could not have been unaware of their terrible peril. When at last Edward Flanagan, the mate, turned on the fire alarm on the excursion steamer, the flames were already reaching out on the port side and panic had begun to seize the nearest passengers.

Soon the terror-stricken excursionists were no longer under control. Though the officers and crew heart breaking sight! As seen by spectators on boats on the river, the people seemed to leap overboard by hundreds, and they rose and fell like little black specks on the broken, foaming swell, churned up by the steamer's big paddles, which still kept turning.

Half a score of tugs and steamboats were now trying to overtake the blazing vessel, for the purpose of rendering assistance and saving life. The red fire was leaping high above the Slocum's framework, and its long, red tongues shot thirty feet in the air, and again swept down parallel to the decks, as if eager to devour their trembling victims. Scorching belts of flame licked the edge of the huddled masses of passengers, and many caught fire in their clothing, while others, blinded and breathless, fell fainting to the decks, to be trodden under foot on the next wild rush of the mob.

At last, after what seemed an eternity, the Slocum reached a point opposite 138th Street, and headed across the river for North Brother Island. As she swept around, the port rail of the after deck gave way with a crash, and several hundred passengers, chiefly women and children, were forced overboard to join those already struggling in the waves. Women in white dresses, children in gay holiday attire, and babies in long robes, dotted the seething waters in the steamer's wake. Several boats had now reached the scene and began the work of rescue, but the tide was strong and the current swift, and many a poor creature sank in sight of help. There were few who could swim.

As the big boat neared the shore, a black mass of smoke shot up from her forward part and sparks and flames quickly followed. This was due to an explosion, which added new horror to the situation. In the very centre of the boat there was now a deep chasm, where part of the framework had collapsed. People began to throw children out into the stream. Mothers, driven to insanity, flung their little ones into the water and leaped after them, many of them to certain death. Many a young life went out with a prayer to God. Mothers, when they saw death to be inevitable, cried out in their agony, and went to their fate with a supplication for Divine mercy on their lips. How many were engulfed in the fiery abyss after the collapse may never be known.

As the burning steamer rounded the point of North Brother Island, Pilots Van Wart and Weaver, who had stuck to their posts, were surrounded by flames on every side. Then began a work of rescue that was full of heroic incidents. The steamers Massasoit and Franklin Edson saved many lives. The fireboat Zophar Mills brought the police reserves from the Alexander Avenue Station and they, too, did splendid service, several policemen performing acts of bravery that stamped them as true heroes. The nurses on the island, and even the consumptive patients, formed "living chains" and reached out into the shallow water to bring in the bodies of the living and the dead. One young ward helper, Mary McCann, swam out four times and each time returned with a living child, saved from a watery grave.

But on the steamer there were still several hundreds in peril, and so dumb with terror that they were utterly incapable of action. Some prayed and sought shelter wherever they could, only to be driven back again by the flames. A little boy of six or seven years climbed the Slocum's flagstaff to get away from the furnace-like heat, but the staff fell back, and the brave little fellow perished. Pastor Haas was rescued from the water, but his wife and child, his mother-in-law, and his wife's sister, were among those who perished.

For hours the work of rescue went on, the fleet of steamers, tugs and rowboats increasing, until the whole river in the neighborhood of the scene was patrolled by the life-savers. Those who survived, were taken care of temporarily on North Brother Island; the injured were sent to the various hospitals, and the dead—who now far outnumbered the living—were laid in rows upon the beach at the island to await the coroner.

In the city, the news of the disaster spread like wild-fire. East side streets were densely crowded. In St. Mark's parish the people were frantic over the loss of their friends. All day long pitifully quiet, white-faced crowd of men, women and children, stood in front of the German Lutheran Church in East Sixth Street.

They were gazing with strained eyes at the bulletins, which were put up from time to time, containing the names of those known to be lost or saved. The former list grew ominously larger, while that of the latter was piteously small. Men with red eyes and haggard faces pressed their way through the crowd, past the policemen at the church gates, which opened to admit them to the vestibule. Here a row of newspaper men at long tables were tabulating names as fast as they received them—the names of those definitely known to be lost or saved, and the missing.

Up and down the streets the crowd surged, congregating at the near-by stations of the elevated road, which was bringing home the few survivors, who were almost mobbed by anxious people, striving to gain some reliable intelligence from eye-witnesses of the awful scene of death.

There was no shrieking or loud wailing in the crowd about the church. Big, bearded men stood patiently waiting, with the look upon their faces that there is no mistaking—that of helpless, hopeless, grief. Women sobbed, but not loudly, and still the throng outside the church grew in numbers, until the street, for a block or more, was a solid mass of humanity. When the bulletin announced that Pastor Haas was among the saved, it seemed to comfort a few, who caught at the straw of hope, that, if the pastor was alive, perhaps others, in whom they were interested, might have been saved.

One man, who said that his wife and seven little ones had gone on the ill-fated excursion, as he gave this information, toppled over in a dead faint, and was carried out from the church vestibule to the street.

Two boys, brothers, stood shivering in a corner of the vestibule, overlooked by the crowd that was surging around the reporters' table.

"I didn't know my brother was saved," said one of the boys, in reply to a question as to what he knew of the disaster. "My mother and two sisters are gone. Oh, I'll never forget it all! Everybody went crazy, and no one could help themselves or anyone else. I tried to help a woman. I didn't know where mother and sisters were, but I wanted to help someone. I took hold of her, and the next I knew I was hit by something in the back, and we were both pitched into the water. Then I lost my senses, and knew nothing more until I found myself on the deck of a tug. When I got ashore, I came down here to the church, where I found my brother. He thought I was lost."

"One little boy," he added, "clung to a post as he sat on the railing of the Slocum, and the fire was all about him. He was not crying or screaming, but just looking up to the sky, and the flames all around. I looked until his hair caught fire, and then his face seemed to melt away, and he was gone."

The brother, who had stood silent, was asked how he was saved.

"I jumped and swam," he replied, "and, when I was near the shore, some one pulled me out of the water with a hay-rake. It caught me by the hand," and held up the bruised and scarred member. "I guess I was 'most gone, I don't remember much, only the awful flames, the cries and shrieks, and the water full of women and babies."

The boys' faces were drawn and haggard, their hair dried clothing clung to their shivering bodies, while their eyes, and dry, choking sobs, as they tried to tell their experiences, testified to their sufferings.

"O, my little girl! My little Bessie! Her father home, crazy; they would not let him come out in the street," sobbed a sweet-faced young German woman, she crouched on the stairs leading to the church gallery. I let her go with my sister-in-law, and her father is wild since he heard the news. How can I go home to her father without Bessie?" she sobbed.

An examination of the lists of the dead and missing shows that a great majority of the victims were women and children of German birth or descent. In many cases, whole families, with the exception of the father, were wiped out, the mothers having taken all the little ones on the excursion. On Sixth Street, and indeed all through the district known as St. Mark's Parish, blinds were drawn on windows and the emblems of death were hanging on doorways so thickly that one might have thought some dreadful plague had decimated the population. On almost every block from Third Avenue to the East River, and from Third Street to Ninth Street, half-masted American flags, draped in sombre black, were hung out, some blocks having the funeral banners so numerous, that they looked like a continuous line. The streets were thronged with "dead wagons" and funeral coaches were so numerous as to render them almost impassable. Little groups of men and women stood talking and mingling their tea together, while little children stood by sobbing over the loss of their playmates. In two tenements on Sixth Street the tenants were mourning for eleven dead, mostly children. Hundreds of funerals were taking place for days after the calamity. Every block had its groups of mourners.

In one house, a flat of four rooms was locked and silent. "They all went on the Slocum," said a weeping neighbor, "and none of them ever came back."

Ten thousand frenzied men, women and children swarmed into the city Morgue shortly after the bodies of the victims began to arrive. At the pier, hundreds of poor charred corpses had been landed, and were lying in rude pine boxes. The first boatload of thirty dead reached the Morgue about 4 P.M. Others rapidly followed, some being from the burned steamer and others from the river. All the bodies were wrapped in blankets or covered with tarpaulins.

Pastor of St. Mark's Lutheran Church

THE "SLOCUM" AFTER THE FIRE HAD DONE ITS WORK

From the Sinners' Benches

Rescue the perishing, care for the dying;
Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave.

By OWEN KILDARE

I BELIEVE there are very few among us who have not heard and do not love this hymn, written by Fanny J. Crosby, our grand poet laureate of Gospel song, and W. H. Doane. And let us hope that, in spite of its refined sweetness, both words and melody have found within us the permanent echo, which is generally only produced by the thundering avalanches of harmony.

It is a good and blessed hymn for everybody, but especially for the men and women who are the heralds of the message "Come unto Me." To those who have never heard it or have forgotten it, that hymn could almost be called the textbook of rescue work.

I am very glad to have this opportunity of writing about what I consider the shortcomings in our present rescue work methods. Elsewhere I have written about work among the fallen, and have been right until "roasted and broiled" on the spit of criticism. I am inclined to believe that most of the letters which reached me were inspired by a misunderstanding of my position in the matter.

When the day comes that you can step up to me and say: "I can prove you have lied when you wrote this," and to prove it, I shall break my pen into atoms, shall be willing to have my lying hand hewn from its wrist, and shall do your bidding in my atonement.

I am not yet so long removed from the days of my iniquity, that I have lost the right to call myself an honorary member of that Great and Unfortunate Order of the Wicked, and I, as their representative, will present our side of the case, that you may either prove us wrong, or else help us to that which we desire.

Put yourself in the place of one who knows naught of religion. He knows that there is such a thing as religion, because he sees churches and has heard of clergymen: but he knows no more about their nature and work, than that they are for betterment, and esteemed by more righteous people than himself.

The time comes when that fateful whisper also reaches his ear, and he hears "Come, come unto Me."

He heeds the message, and, feeling that he would not fit into the picture as presented in the church edifice, he seeks the humbler proxy, the rescue mission, to make it the scene of his compact with the Master.

Of course the routine of the service will not halt for him, and, until the time comes when he can kneel and end his plea up to the throne, he listens to the words and songs.

The discourse surprises him. It so happens that the speaker is a so-called undenominational radical, one who cannot speak without disparaging regular churches and clergymen. He criticizes the tone and text of sermons; the church methods; their supposed aloofness; yes, even their coldness toward the unfortunate sinner. He speaks as if an inimical spirit existed between church and rescue mission work.

Some time ago I heard a man say this from the platform: "Thank God for these missions! (Amen to that!) I'm a Christian, and will stay one if all the churches vanish and only these rescue missions are left. I do not go to church on Sunday; I come to a mission where I can hear the Word plainly and simply, and not as they preach it in the pulpits."

I ask you in all fairness, is that the sort of talk to give to men and women who only know of the existence of religion by the steeples of its temples? Is it not a hindrance to one's salvation to have the message presented with the sweetness of a Henry Ward Beecher, or in the heart-burning words of a DeWitt Talmage?

Here is a duty to be performed by leaders and superintendents of missions: Be censors of what shall be said from your platforms. You are pledged to bring our sinners nearer to Him, right to his very feet, and should not permit to have them puzzled and thrown into doubt by well-intended, perhaps well-founded, discussions of existing conditions.

Would you consider it a convalescing remedy to picture the horrors of delirium tremens to the drunkard, just released from the alcoholic ward in Bellevue? Would you not rather strengthen his unnerved mind and will by cheerful geniality and caring kindness? The man was sick, a victim of the most dreadful of diseases.

"Among the crowd . . . sit many men ragged and demoralized"

Why then should you throw the doubting and disbelieving sinner, right at the very threshold, into a sea of doubt and partisanship? Tell him rather the truth, which is, that, were it not for the churches, and the clergymen and congregations worshipping in them, we would have fewer missions, and they would be more hampered in their work.

Let us concede, for the sake of argument, that the churches are not sufficiently aggressive in rescue work. Is there not a parallel to be found in college and university settlement work? The Alma Mater is not directly active, but is responsible for the impulse, the doctrine, the theory, which finds an outlet in most practical and intelligent work. Is not that what the church does, and perhaps in a larger, broader, more embracing way? Is not the church the stimulus which creates in us a love for our fellow-men, and the desire to help those less blessed than ourselves? And as to the clergymen, why, one has only to spend a day with a city pastor to learn what a busy life his is. Why sneer at the pastors of our fashionable churches? Would you wish the "fashionables" to be without spiritual guidance, or do you not think, with a spreading public opinion, that they need the prop of religion more than the less fashionable? I am not rich, but I think that riches honestly earned, may be the means of saving many from breaking hearts, and averting bitter regrets and bitterer repentance.

That many missions owe their very existence and support to a maternal church seems to be only too often forgotten. I have sat on the benches facing the platform, and I know that we, the unsaved, were not especially edified by hearing slighting allusions to churches and ministers.

The most interesting service ever witnessed by me in a rescue mission was one I attended at my very start in the sunny life. The speaker's earnestness was evident, and was enhanced by his thorough knowledge of the Bible. He was as sure of his Biblical personages and data as the professor of history is sure of his kings and legendary battles. There was a convincing definiteness in his discourse which made us all sit up and listen, until we forgot that we were listening with suddenly awakened faith, to events and miracles at which we had often laughed in our superior unbelief. Then came the lesson from it, and from that the deduction that the God of then was the God of to-day, ready to forgive and to receive the sinner of this moment, as he had been ready to forgive the blood-stained warrior of a score of centuries ago. It brought it to our callous, sneering, filthy hearts that we had listened to the Gospel of an all-forgiving love, and each man felt that on that mighty bosom a place for his weary head was waiting for him.

Yes, that man could speak, and speak persuasively. And that is what is needed on rescue platforms. But on how many can it be found?

No one among us, who has cleft a place for himself or herself among the productive workers of the day, has done so without some self-training. The fireman who risks his life in saving yours, must undergo the drill of weary months before considered efficient for his duty. If you are in the work of saving men's lives from a worse fate than flames, should you not train yourself also?

Faith, yes, you must have that, and abundance of it; but your results will be greater if you add efficacy to faith. And it can be had easily.

A mission superintendent told me that his salary was very small and his work very trying. But no matter how small the salary, books are very cheap and make the work easier. At times, when I step down from the speaker's place at churches or other assemblages, I feel ashamed of myself for having left so much unsaid and for having said the thing so feebly. Were I trained for speaking, these shortcomings would be remedied or at least improved. If the manner of speaking were unimportant, seminaries and training schools would not give it its important place in the curriculum. Text-books of rhetoric are very cheap, and you owe it to yourself to speak the message to the fallen as intelligently as you can learn it to speak. Among the crowd before you sit many men, ragged and demoralized, but educated and intellectually equipped and it lies with you to incite their respect, which will be followed by conviction.

All this does not imply that we of the sinners' benches expect a display of oratorical fireworks. We do not! We expect simplicity, the simpler the better, but we ought to have distinct utterance, a rational succession of facts and convincing peroration. There is a lot of shallow scepticism, bred in lodging-house rooms or gin-mills, in the cobwebbed minds before you, and their life has narrowed down to such a pessimistic level that nothing but facts will convince them. And in the giving of facts you should have no trouble, for have you not the blessed chronicle of his works beside you?

The tenor of the testimony part lies with the leader of the meeting. As a whole, all testimonies are helpful, but converts intuitively will take their cue from the leader as to whether having the personal note prevail or to submerge it and sound His glorious harmony instead. The right kind of a testimony, rightly given, is of untold value. You can hear them in all meetings, and I never listen to one without shaking the convert's hand and telling him that I feel honored to know a true man.

A part of the service, managed with varying degrees of effectiveness in the different missions, is the singing of the hymns. I do not speak of the special song services, but of the singing at the regular meetings.

Modern science has proven that music is a mighty agent in swaying our temperamental emotions. Why, then, do we not make a greater effort to have the Gospel songs put us into a receptive mood?

Live but for a day the life of an outcast, apparently buffeted by men and fate alike, and you will understand the mellowness which a sweet melody can bring to that quivering heart.

Sometime ago, I sat in the midnight mission in Doyer Street. A wise leader, noticing the effect produced by his plain, straightforward talk, asked a lady to sing a solo, while he went among the men to make a canvass of their consciences for the sake of their souls.

"Where is My Wandering Boy To-night?" was the lady's choice, and it was sung with no more striving for artificial embellishment than she would have employed at her piano in her own home. But the strains of the simple melody floated through space, stopping just long enough at the heart of every man to knock at the door of his treasure vault of memories and not a move, barely a breath, disturbed the singer for a long time, until—a draft may have caused it—a chorus of sniffing and suspicious coughing made itself heard, while many noses were blown with a too emphatic fervor. Most heads hung low; but on the faces I could see that the traces of sin, lust and degradation were, for the time,

Giving Testimony

The American Pulpit

SERMON BY

The WAITING CRISIS

TEXT—Exodus 14: 13: "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord"

O fall back, in order to go forward; to retreat, in order to advance; to evacuate, in order to conquer; aye, that is the course most great military chieftains have had to take, at least once in life, before they won their ultimate triumphs. Such a line of tactics won for our nation that independence, the anniversary festival of which we are soon to celebrate. George Washington at Yorktown would never have been possible, had there not first been a Washington's retreat from Long Island. When General Mifflin, with a small detachment of troops acting as sentinels over wooden guns, deceived the British army while the American troops, in dense fog, quietly paddled past Lord Howe's fleet, and slipped through the fingers of Sir Henry Clinton, America's liberties were rescued from almost certain strangulation. Had Washington stayed to obstinately hold his ground after the bloody battle of Long Island, the American army would have been annihilated or captured. It is not always a good plan for a general to cut his bridges behind him. Had there been no retreat from Bohemia after the battle of Kolin, and no evacuation of Berlin after the slaughter of Kunersdorf, there would have been no humiliation of a Maria Theresa, and no Frederick the Great, whose name has been the marvel not only of Prussia, but of all Europe and the civilized world. Nathaniel Greene, the mighty military leader of the Revolutionary War, second only in power to George Washington, was aptly called "The Great Retreater." He never won a decisive battle in his life. So it has been with other military chieftains. There is strategy in eluding a foe whose strength is superior. Many a general has kept the field and worn out the patience of an enemy by avoiding a decisive battle, and in the end has proved victorious.

Fortitude in Waiting

There may come times in the battle of life when a man is to fight, and times when a man is to run. There also come other times when a man is to be like a Moses "encamped before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea over against Baal-zephon." On the one side of him was the Red Sea; on the other side of him were the pursuing hosts of the Philistines. He could not run. There was no place to run to. He could not fight Pharaoh. He knew he would have been annihilated in the conflict. He could do nothing but wait. He had to "stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord." Moses was like Sir Henry Lawrence, entrapped in the residency of Lucknow during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857. For three long months the little English garrison, surrounded by a hundred thousand murderous demons; had to do nothing but wait. They just kept on waiting for the rescuers, who fought their way up from Calcutta under the leadership of that hero of heroes, Sir Henry Havelock. Moses was like Gen. Charles George Gordon, who for ten long months just had to wait and continue to wait in the besieged city of Khartoum, and then gave up his life only a few days before the English rescuers hove in sight. Moses was like the foreigners, praying and hoping, and hoping and praying in the missionary compounds of Peking, waiting for the allied troops to deliver them from their impending fate during the Boxer uprising of China in 1900. They were too strong as a body to have to surrender. They were not strong enough as a body to fight their way to the English ships. And so, hemmed in and driven in on all sides, they just stood their ground fighting for their existence by day and sleeping on their guns by night. They were waiting—simply waiting. They were standing still, to see the salvation of the Lord.

Sanctified Patience

Very easy it is for most of us to go forward in the battle of life when the Divine command is given clearly and distinctly, "Charge. Let the whole line charge!" Easy it is for most of us to retreat when the command is given clearly and distinctly, "Fall back. Let the whole line fall back!" But it is another matter for us to stand still. It is another matter to patiently wait. Yet waiting is a very great element in spiritual success, as it is in temporal success. How much a factor is "The Waiting Crisis" in the successes of life can be well learned in the words which Dr. Cuyler taught a few years ago, when he said, "I have been conversant in my time with thousands of failures of talented men, both in New York and Brooklyn. And I can bear testimony that ninety-nine hundredths of all those failures were, without doubt, due to the lack of patience, both in a spiritual sense as well as in a temporal." It is to teach the important lessons of sanctified patience that I am preaching this sermon.

The waiting crisis comes to thousands upon thousands of faithful men and women in the struggle for a financial existence. It comes not to the lazy, good-for-nothing human beings, who think the world owes them a living, and, therefore, they do nothing. It comes not to the tramps, the loafers, the dead-beats, who, as derelicts on the great highway seas of life, are a menace to all with whom they come in touch. But it comes to the young man who gets up promptly at six o'clock, and goes to the store punctually on time. It comes to the conscientious lawyer and doctor and mechanic, who are striving with all their power to do right. It comes to men and women, who, in every sense, are noble, who always seem to be on the verge of making a great success and yet never seem to be quite able to reach the goal.

The Superstition of Luck

These men are true and good men, but unfortunate men. They are what worldly people call "unlucky." We know there is no such thing as luck. Men are not lucky or unlucky, but there are some who seem to have more misfortunes than others—who, through no fault of their own, miss the good things of life. The strong man triumphs over them, but as the world witnesses his struggles under successive strokes of adverse fortune, it calls him "unlucky." When old Anselm Mayer Rothschild, the founder of the famous banking-house of Frankfort-on-the-Rhine, was dying, he called his children about him, and gave to them this parting advice: "First, my sons, never plan any great movement without first consulting your mother. Secondly, never have anything to do with an unlucky man." Mark this! Anselm Mayer Rothschild did not say: "Do not have any business dealings with a dishonest man." He took that for granted. But he did say, "an unlucky man." You know who is that unlucky man. He is yourself. You are unlucky in the fact that, just as you were about to go to college, your father died, and you were taken out of school and had to go to work. You are unlucky in the fact that, just after you had saved up a little money and put it in the bank, the cashier became a defaulter, and you lost all. You are unlucky in the fact that, just after you had learned to be a good draughtsman, and had a fine position about to be offered, you fell and broke your arm, or had your fingers cut off, by having them caught in the cogs of a factory wheel, and you had to start life all over again. You are unlucky, because just as you were about to be appointed to a certain position, an enemy lied about your character, as an enemy lied about a young friend of mine, who was about to become pastor of a prominent church in the East. Though your character, in one sense was vindicated, yet the damage was done. Another stepped in and got the place, even as the poor invalid, at the pool of Bethesda, was pushed aside by others again and again, when the angel of health "went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the waters." After having been repeatedly struck down by misfortune after misfortune, you are to-day on the verge of complete despair. You are saying to yourself: "Oh, I am always unlucky! What is the use of my trying any longer?"

The Opened Way

Discouraged, are you? "Yes," you mutter, "fearfully discouraged!" You have conscientiously done your level best? "Yes, I have done my level best. I can do nothing more." Oh yes, you can, my brother. You can let God now come and do the rest. You are simply "encamped before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon." God is going to open a way for you through the Red Sea to escape the pursuing Philistines. How? I do not know. This, however, I do know. God will rescue you if you are patient, only patient. He will, if like Job amid the tragedy of a wrecked home, and amid a ruined fortune, and in the agonies of physical as well as mental pain, you can say, and still continue to say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." God will show to you a direct means of escape if you will only stand still just where you are, and continue to look for the salvation of the Lord. You may not now think it; but all things, even amid the greatest discouragements, all things are working together for good to them that love the Lord. After the darkest of nights, there always comes the brightness of a light-giving dawn. Amid the blackest of troubles, there will always come a pillar of fire to lead God's children to a Promised Land. Trust him, brother. Continue to trust God. Be patient. Just go on and continue to do your level best. All things will ultimately come out right if you do. That is the teaching of this grand old text. "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord."

But there is another class of hearers I find to-day encamped among the Israelitish hosts near Pi-hahiroth. They are the men and the women who are not necessarily struggling for a financial existence, but who are unhappy and dissatisfied with the fields in which God has compelled them to labor. They know they could do better work amid other surroundings. Or they are saying to themselves, "I do not know why it is that all my labors should be misconstrued and unappreciated. If God does not open to me another field of work soon I shall drop this position anyhow."

Promotion for the Faithful

Going to give up your present position? You say you are not happy in it? Don't you do it, my brother. What you need in life in this waiting crisis of yours, a great big invigorating dose of patience. Stand still just where you are, and do your work the best way you can and see the salvation of the Lord. God does not, as a rule, call his workmen from nothing to something great, but from a small position of influence to a high position of influence. When Christ wanted to select his cabinet and to fill the apostolic positions of the "Fishers of men," he did not go into the market-place where he could find the loafers idling around. He went down to the shores of Lake Galilee and found two stalwart men casting their nets into the sea. He said to Peter, and Andrew his brother, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." It is nearly always a hard struggle for a man in a small position to climb into a higher position. But it is nearly always an almost impossible struggle for a man out of a job to be called to a fine position. Christ uttered sound philosophy when he said in his parable, "Take therefore thy talent from him and give it unto him who hath ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." It is easy enough for the pastor of a successful church in New York to be called to a prosperous church of Chicago. But a minister without a pulpit, though he be a giant among preachers, has an almost insurmountable undertaking to be called to any strong pulpit. The man without a job is a man whose failure is stamped upon his brow, and every one looks at him with suspicion. Be patient. Everything will come out a right. Just be patient.

Discontent a Sin

But there is still another reason why I do not want you to give up that position which seems to fret you. As far as I can make out, you are getting in life just about as much as you deserve. Instead of complaining, you ought to get down on your knees and thank God for the position which he has given to you. What should you expect God to make you his favorite child and allow you to rest upon a bed of roses? Are you any different from any of his other children? Are you so smart, or so good, or so humble that you have a right to expect more than they? Instead of grumbling about your small position, you should see men, in every way your superiors, physically mentally and spiritually, occupying smaller positions than you. Be patient in that work God has given to you. Most of us, ay, perhaps all of us, have all we deserve in life and more too. If God wants us to go higher, he will open the way. If he does not open the way, then let us do what he wants us to do. You and I are not so important, or so brilliant, or so perfectly sanctified as some of us think we are. In order to impress upon you this fact, I would read to you a quaint piece of poetry by James Whitcomb Riley. It has helped an encouraged me much in life. I hope the reading will make you contented in the field of labor to which God has called you to work.

The signs are bad, when folks commence
A-finding fault with Providence,
And balking 'cause the world don't shake
At every prancing step they take;
No man is great, till he can see How less than little he would be,
If stripped to self, and stark and bare,
He hung his sign out anywhere.

My doctrine is to lay aside
Contentions and be satisfied;
Jest do your best, and praise or blame
That follers, that counts just the same,
I've allers noticed great success
Is mixed with trouble, more or less.
And it's the man who does the best,
That gets more kicks than all the rest.

But roaming in and out among the Israelitish hosts encamped at Pi-hahiroth, I find the ranks of the Mosaic army cursed and retarded with hangers-on. There were many brave men in that army. Men there were like Joshua and Caleb; but there was also a host of lazy good-for-nothings, as in every army, who expected others to do all the work. When the tents were to be lifted, they were not there. When the manna was to be collected, they were like the five foolish virgins, who wanted to borrow the oil of the five wise virgins. And so to-day, when I see a strong, willing man, I inevitably see a lot of human leeches clinging to that man, as barnacles stick to a ship's hull. Furthermore, to-day, I see scores and hundreds of you hard-working men and women, reeling at the injustice by which others are trying to live off the results of the sweat of your brow.

Let me illustrate my thought by drawing a verbal picture of what we all know to be true: There are four of us boys, all brothers, born in a humble farmhouse way back in the country. Two of my brothers and myself are just happy go-lucky boys. Oh, yes, we work hard when we work; but we work just as little as we can. And when we have a dollar, we always spend the whole dollar. If there is a country dance, my two brothers and I always go there. If I have a leisure hour, you can always find us loafing around the village store, or playing pranks upon the boys. We are not bad; we are just ordinary, happy-go-lucky, every-day boys. We are like most of boys. We do what we are told to do, and do nothing more.

But I have a brother Jack. The young folks say he is queer and mean and stingy. Some people say he is crazy. My brother Jack is not lazy. He works just as hard as we do; but when he makes a dollar, instead of spending that dollar as we do, he saves it, or goes and buys some books. Instead of loafing about the village store in the evening, Jack is always home studying. If he is not crazy, Jack is certainly queer. One day Jack comes in and tells us he is going to teach winter school in order to go to college. We think then he is crazier still. After awhile, Jack, by working all his summers and all winters, gets through college, and then comes home and tells us that he is going to the law school. We think he is crazier still. After awhile, Jack, by years of self-sacrifice and hard work, is graduated. Then he goes to New York City. After awhile, my brother Jack pushes his way to the front of the New York bar. What is the result? Do we boys raise Jack for his labors? Do we say, "If we had worked as he worked, we could be where he is?" Perhaps. But that is not the general rule of the average family. We immediately begin to complain, because Jack does not send us money, and help to support us. We take from him all we can get. And so, when any man honestly tries to make success out of life, he immediately has a lot of indigent, selfish, lazy folks about him trying to live off the results of his hard-earned toil.

Someone listening to me says, "Yes, that is so." Then you turn and say, "What shall I do about my drunken brother's family? Shall I pay any more money to let him keep on drinking?" "What shall I do about my daughter?" says another. "I do not want her to leave her husband, and yet I certainly do not want to keep on supporting both of them in their foolish extravagances." "What shall I do about my wayward boy?" says another. "Shall I let him go to the dogs, and not support him any longer?" "What shall I do in reference to that lazy partner?" says another. "He won't work, and yet he expects half of the profits." "What shall I do in reference to my husband?" says a troubled wife. "He is always loafing around, or entering into wild-cat speculations, which bring us in nothing to support the family." "What shall I do in reference to my wife?" says a troubled husband. "She spends my money right and left. She is more interested in euchre parties than in the economy of the home. Shall I leave her?" "What shall you do, my friends? Well, I am not here to tell you in detail; but this I do assert in general: do not let the injustices of the past blind your eyes to the pressing duties of the present. Because your kith and in and business partners have been and are now doing wrong to you, do not you do wrong to them. Be patient. Be careful, and if you must err, let it be upon the side of mercy. God does not tell you to weigh the last, so much as to conscientiously solve the pressing responsibilities directly at hand. "Stand still" before you snap the golden cords of affection, which bind you to that wayward sister, that wayward brother, that wayward child, that wayward husband. "Stand still," if you do not know what to do. "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord."

Be very patient when sickness comes and old age comes and the wearing faculties of mind and body seem to unfit you for the active duties of life. Be very patient when you seem to be like an old, worn-out horse turned out upon the commons, to eat a little and sleep a little and live a little longer and then die. Some of us with great gusto in the days of our youth, used to sing in Sunday School that old hymn:

Oh, to be nothing, nothing!
Only to lie at his feet,
A broken and empty vessel,
For the Master's use made meet.

But when the advancing years pass on, and by sickness or old age we seem to be laid away upon the shelf as useless, by a busy world, then most of us do not apsaddest scene during all my stay in the West, was, when in the Methodist Episcopal Conference, five noble men, who had served their church as Bishops long and faithfully, were retired and placed upon the superannuated list. But as God has placed some of you upon the great "waiting list" as physical or mental ineffectives, be patient. Trust him. Even in your retired field of waiting, you have a work to do. It will all come out right. Yes, sick one and aged one, it will all come out right. You may not be able to understand God's ways now, but it will all come out right.

Thus, to-day, as the "waiting" lesson is the hardest of all Gospel lessons to learn, I am going to close in the beautiful words of one whose poem has been very near and dear to me. I am preaching against my own impatience just as I am against yours. I know that a parent can never bring his child up right, unless he teaches that child to learn to trust him and wait. Therefore, no child of God can ever trust God, unless he is at times ready to "stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord." These verses embody the whole thought of my text:

When my boy with eager questions,
Asking how and where and when,
Taxes all my store of wisdom,
Asking o'er and o'er again,
Questions oft to which the answers,
Give to others still the key,
I have said, to teach him patience,
Wait, my little one, and see.

And the words I taught my darling,
Taught to me a lesson sweet,
Once when all the world seemed darkness,
And the storm about me beat,
In the children's room I heard him,
With a child's sweet mimicry,
To the baby brother's questions,
Saying wisely, "wait and see."

Like an angel's tender chiding,
Came the darling's words to me,
Though my Father's ways were hidden,
Bidding me still, "wait and see."
What are we but restless children,
Ever asking what shall be?
And the Father in his wisdom,
Gently bids us "wait and see."

PROGRESS IN HEATHEN LANDS

AT a meeting of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church, held in New York recently, the Rev. Arthur J. Brown, who recently made a missionary tour of the world, made an address, in the course of which he drew a very interesting contrast of missionary lands a generation ago and at the present time. He said: "Africa was closed to the missionary until Livingstone lay dying in his tent, in 1873. Now there are forty-six steamers on the Congo; the Cape-to-Cairo Railroad is half completed; the missionary may ride into Uganda in a railway train, and a great society of British scientists will next summer hold its meetings at Victoria Falls. A Russian minister has declared that when the railroad is completed, we shall be able to make the journey from St. Petersburg to Peking in fourteen days. I fear he has not asked permission of the Japanese."

The most wonderful railroad of them all, Mr. Brown declared, was the Anatolian Railroad, which, starting from Constantinople, passes through the spot where Jacob wrestled, through Haroun-al-Raschid's old capital, through Nineveh and Babylon.

"All the heathen nations are now partitioned up among the Christian nations," he went on. "Our influence is to be paramount. What are we going to do with it? In Japan, I found them weaving Australian cotton on German machines. In Korea, in a village which a white man had never visited, we found the natives carrying water in Standard Oil cans. In the apartments of the Empress Dowager of China, I counted forty-one foreign-made clocks; and in the Emperor's study, three organs, a globe and maps, all English made. American lamps are used everywhere by the Chinese. The brother of the King of Siam is the president of a bicycle club of four hundred members—and the bicycles are all American, too! After traveling for a month up the Meinam River, in Siam, we got out one day to rest ourselves, and hearing a familiar burring in a hut, went to see. It came from an American sewing machine. Our sewing machines have penetrated to the most remote corners of Asia. We are sending agricultural implements and padlocks to Persia; our locomotives are pulling trains up the hills of Japan and India; our bridge builders have thrown a bridge over the stream where Cambyes was swallowed up; from the pyramids forty centuries look down, not on French soldiers, but on American manufactures.

"It is sometimes objected," said Mr. Brown, in concluding, "that the Chinese do not want Christianity. What of it? What of it? Does the world anywhere want Jesus? The question that confronts us is not whether the heathen wants Christ, but whether they need him."

"All There was Left of it"

PASTOR.—"Why, whatever made you use your Bible so shockingly, Mr. Truman? What have you been doing to it?"

PARISHIONER.—"It's all the result of your preaching, sir. When I went home from church each Sunday, I cut out of the Book that which you had criticized in your sermon of that day. That verse on the Trinity was an interpolation; so out went the strong verse. Then the canonicity of this book and that was doubtful; so out went this book, and that. John did not write the Gospel of John; so out went what was called the Gospel of John. This bit of history was not history, only allegory; so out went that false and deceiving thing. Positively, sir, I have been faithful with my shears, and this is all the Bible I have left—the two covers and a few tatters."

preciate the petition of that song-prayer. We do not want to be "nothing, nothing." We want to be "something, something," and have that something a very active "something." Sometimes at the funeral of a strong man, we see a suggestive floral tribute in a broken column. That means the man died in his prime. That means most of us say, "Is it not too bad that he had to go when he had so much to live for." But I do not think it takes nearly as much divine grace to die in your physical and mental prime, as it takes to live on in physical invalidism, or in decrepit old age. In the first instance, a Christian man like a warrior, is struck down at a blow. In the second instance, a man is like an aged veteran in a soldier's home like a Job's war charger smelling the battle from afar, and yet not able to answer the bugle call for the grand charge. The

The Holocaust on the River

GHASTLY in its horrors, heartrending in its pathos, is the story told on another page of the awful calamity which befell New York on June 15. When we read of a thousand men being slain in battle, the slaughter does not seem so terrible, because the soldier knows he is liable to be slain and he is himself intending to slay others. But in this case the victims were women and children, belonging chiefly to the class whose pleasures are few and who were expecting to enjoy one of their rare holidays. They were, too, in no way responsible for their sad fate. When people knowingly run risks, or by misconduct, or carelessness, or the defiance of God's laws, show their disregard of Providence, and are overwhelmed in disaster, our pity has to include considerations of contributory negligence. But these poor victims were distinctly identified with religion, and their connection with a Sunday School was the occasion of their sad death. It is sorrowful in the extreme, and their fate is one of those mysteries of Providence which in this life we can never solve.

For the bereaved we have the most profound sympathy. God alone can comfort the men who have lost wives and children. He alone can support them in their appalling desolation. May his grace, which is sufficient for every need, come into their hearts and enable them to look to him for succor, and in their bitter sorrow cling still more closely to him!

Doubtless there will be searching inquiry into the management which could admit of so fearful a calamity. There ought to be measures taken which will render the recurrence of so terrible a tragedy impossible. Owners of boats, which are almost daily crowded during the summer, should be compelled to substitute metal for thickly-painted and varnished wood in the construction of their vessels, even though it might diminish their profits. The boats and life-preservers ought to be in good order and easily accessible, and the officers and crews men who do not lose presence of mind in a panic and who are not more intent on saving their own lives than the lives of others in a disaster. Legislation may do these things and others, to prevent a repetition of the horror; but, alas! for the past, there is no remedy.

It may be hoped that those who perished had profited by the lessons that were taught by the devoted pastor and the teachers in the church and Sunday School to which they belonged. There is that consolation in the trouble, that they had heard the Gospel and had identified themselves with Christ's cause in the world. For all who had really given themselves to him, we sorrow, not as those who have no hope. They are in his keeping with whom there is fulness of joy and blessings for evermore. With what thrilling tones does the calamity of their sudden taking off utter its warning to all: "Be ye also ready." What for them, in that sad hour, were all their possessions, their occupations, the education the children had been receiving, and all the interests which make so important a part of our daily lives? The one question of paramount concern for them was whether they had committed their souls to Christ's keeping, and could count on his salvation. None can know how soon, by disaster or by natural causes, that question may become of the intensest interest, and therefore it should have immediate attention. Then "whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's."

William Penn's Peace Plan

IT is a cheering sign of the strong vitality of the Peace Movement that, at a gathering so distinguished and representative as that which lately assembled at Mohonk Lake, N. Y., the tone of the addresses should have been so optimistic and full of confidence.

In these times of frequent Peace Congresses, especially in our own land, it is interesting and instructive to recall the fact that over 200 hundred years ago, or in 1693-94, when Europe was convulsed with war, William Penn published his famous "Peace Plan," which, though it doubtless found many to approve, was derided by the governments and potentates as visionary and impracticable. Yet the grand old Quaker's idea might well have served as a model for the Hague Conference. Penn thus elaborated his plan for concerted action:

Now if the Sovereign Princes of Europe, who represent that Society, or Independent State of Men that was previous to the Obligations of Society, would, for the same Reason that engaged Men first into Society, viz: Love of Peace and Order, agree to meet by their Stated Deputies in a General Dyet, Estates or Parliament, and there Establish Rules of Justice for Sovereign Princes to observe one to another; and thus to meet Yearly, or once in Two or Three Years at farthest, or as they shall see Cause, and to be Stiled, The Sovereign or Imperial Dyet, Parliament, or State of Europe; before which Sovereign Assembly, should be brought all Differences depending between one Sovereign and another, that cannot be made up by private Embassies, before the Sessions begin; and that if any of the Sovereignties that Constitute these Imperial States, shall refuse to submit their Claim or Pretensions to them, or to abide and perform the Judgment thereof, and seek their Remedy by Arms, or delay their Compliance beyond the Time prefixt in their Resolutions, all the other Sovereignties, United as One Strength, shall compel the Submission and Performance of the Sentence, with Damages to the Suffering Party, and Charges to the Sovereignties that obliged their Submission. Europe would quietly obtain the so much desired and needed Peace, to Her harassed Inhabitants; no Sovereignty in Europe, having the Power, and therefore cannot show the Will to dispute the Conclusion; and, consequently, Peace would be procured, and continued.

Has the world in these two centuries come any nearer to the realization of Penn's vision of universal peace? Notwithstanding the overshadowing war clouds, there is sunlight behind. Friends of Peace are to-day a thousandfold more numerous and more influential. Arbitration has been successfully adopted in the adjustment of some of the gravest international disputes. Yes, we have progressed materially. Amid the passion and strife of the earlier time, the gleam of light and hope kindled by Penn was quickly extinguished and forgotten. Let us hope that the general progress of the nations in education, in fraternal sympathy and in humanity, may keep alive the rekindled flame on the altar of Peace, until it illuminates every land under the sun.

"I Was There With You, Too"

TO be followers of Christ in the great battle he is waging and is sure to win against all that hurts, all that degrades, all that pollutes, all that destroys this world which he loves, and for which he died; to be a soldier under Jesus, with Jesus in this holy war—think what will be the glory of it by and by.

A few years ago, a distinguished general of the Civil War was delivering an address on an occasion when many of his old soldiers were present. Just in front of him sat the gray-haired, battle-scarred veterans, listening with trembling lips and shining eyes, while their old leader recalled a certain summer morning. He described the blue sky, the green fields, the buttercups on the grass, the gray fences, the white tents. Then, as he went on, they heard the neighing of horses, the distant bugle-call, the shouts of officers, the tramp of men. Now they saw the lines formed, the charge begun, the smoke, the enemy on the hill-top. Then followed the reverberating roar of cannon, the rattling of musketry, the whistle of bullets, the crash of shells—all the noise and confusion and thunder of battle. And then came at last the wavering and the breaking of the hostile lines, the shout of triumph, the ecstasy of victory.

Immediately in front of the speaker sat a grizzled old soldier, eagerly drinking in every word. At the very climax of the vivid description, he cried out with bewildered rapture, "I was there with you, too!"

When the warfare of life is over, and the Captain of our salvation stretches forth his scarred hand to tell of the heroism of his church, of the conflict and the victory, will it not be worth far more than all the sacrifices and sorrows and tears of earth, to be able to stand in our place before him and say, "Blessed Saviour, I was there with you, too!"

OUR NEW SERIAL

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 27 will appear the opening chapters of a new and brilliant Serial Story, written expressly for this journal by the well known author Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, Chaplain United States Navy. Chaplain Brady has already won high honors in the literary world as the author of "The Freedom of the Sea," "The Southerners," and other tales, which have made his name known far and wide as a writer of the first rank.

His new serial, which is entitled

The Two Captains

A Story of Bonaparte and Nelson is by far the most attractive and fascinating story that has yet come from his versatile pen. It is a historical tale of the days of Napoleon Bonaparte and Admiral Nelson, and these two characters figure in it prominently throughout. The action of the story takes place in the years 1793 and 1798. The historic incidents center around the siege of Toulon in Southern France, in 1793, in which Bonaparte first attracts the attention of the world to his military genius; and the epoch-making "Battle of the Nile," in the Bay of Aboukir, in Egypt, in 1798, in which Nelson forever shatters the Frenchman's dream of Empire in the East.

Both of these great captains are introduced in the romance in the earlier periods of their careers. The story revolves around the love of Captain Robert Martineau, an officer in the English navy, under Nelson, and Louise de Vaudemont, granddaughter of Vice Admiral de Vaudemont, a great Royalist noble and officer in the old navy of France before the Revolution. One of the leading characters is Brebœuf, a silent Breton sailor, who interferes at critical points to promote the welfare of the young lovers.

The scene shifts from sea to shore in rapid alternation. The coast of Provence, the land of the minstrel and the troubadour; the city of Toulon, grim-walled, cannon-circled; the blue waters of the Mediterranean; the sandy shores of Egypt, the ancient city of Alexandria, the Bay of Aboukir, are the successive settings of the dramatic story. General Bonaparte and Admiral Nelson both take part in the story, and are described with fidelity and accuracy.

Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should see to it, that the rare literary treat which this brilliant historical romance offers is enjoyed not only by his own immediate family circle, but by some friend or acquaintance who is not now a reader of this journal. The opportunity to subscribe now, in order that they may enjoy the complete story of "The Two Captains" from the very first chapter to the last, is one not to be overlooked. Urge them to subscribe now, and join with the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family in the enjoyment of Chaplain Brady's splendid, pure, historic, and romantic story.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST E. R. HERMISTON has just closed a delightful series of meetings at Fallon, Nev. A large number confessed Christ, and as there was no church in the town, an organization was effected, and money raised for a building and a pastor secured.

—EVANGELIST H. D. SHELDON, has recently closed two weeks of successful work in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Oneonta, N. Y. More than a hundred enrolled themselves as seekers. Many were converted, and fifty-two united with the Church on probation.

DR. C. C. VINTON, General Secretary of the proposed Conference of missionaries to be held in Korea, September 18 to 25, next, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that "a extensive plans have been given up for this year. Very likely they will be renewed for another year, in peace time."

Cheap Immigration

OVER a thousand immigrants are now detained at Ellis Island, New York's immigration depot, awaiting special inquiry as to the propriety of admitting them to the country. There are besides these, a large number in the hospitals, who were in urgent need of medical treatment when they arrived. There is a probability that a large proportion of these detained immigrants will be sent back to the countries from which they came; for those who do not satisfy the Commissioners on their first examination, often fail to pass the special inquiry which is ordered. The causes of exclusion are generally disease, mental incapacity, poverty and illiteracy. The law in illiteracy is not stringent, but it does require that the immigrant shall be able to read and write in his own language. As to poverty, the law is liberally administered, but more care will probably be taken in future, as the Commissioners are receiving applications for relief from immigrants who have failed to make their way here. No less than 729 such applications have already been received this year from immigrants who have been here less than two years.

It is expected that during the summer there will be an enormous increase in the number of immigrants owing to the rate war now being waged between the various transportation lines of steamships. It is now possible to cross from Liverpool to New York in the steerage for $9.60, and some of the lines are offering special rates from Antwerp, Rotterdam, Boulogne, Hamburg, etc. When the news of the cheap rate reaches the people of the poorer classes in Northern Europe, Italy, and the Balkan Provinces, there will be probably an enormous number of immigrants, and a more rigorous examination will be needed. Some of the early comers have already arrived, who have not a cent in their pockets, and have no relatives here who can support them while they are looking for employment. That with their low state of intelligence and their inability to speak our language, they are liable to become a public charge, is obvious. Apart from that liability here is also the difficulty of assimilating them, which is greater in the case of the more ignorant comers. Doubtless many who come will have to be sent back, and their disappointment will be severe. It is much to be wished that there was a similar eagerness to enter the kingdom of Christ, from which none are turned back on account of poverty or ignorance.

Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37).

Red Tape Protracts Suffering

Half an hour of acute pain was endured by an injured man in New York, a few days ago, through strict adherence to the rules of the hospitals. A truckman, who was hauling a box from his wagon to an elevator shaft, lost the grip of his hook, and fell backwards down the shaft. He was seriously injured, and, when he was lifted out, one of the passers-by telephoned to a hospital or the ambulance. The official at the hospital replied that they never sent an ambulance except at the call of a policeman. Search was made for a policeman, but he could not be found. A telephone message was then sent to Police Headquarters, and a call for an ambulance was sent to the hospital from there. A kindly ruck-driver put the injured man on his wagon, and drove him to headquarters, where the ambulance found him. The surgeon went in and examined him, and, hurrying to the door, called to the driver of the ambulance to bring him some bandages, but the driver declined, saying he was hired to drive, not to carry bandages. A policeman, hearing the reply, procured them and took them in. Eventually, after a delay of more than half an hour, the sufferer was taken to the hospital. It may be hoped that no serious mischief will result to him from the delay. There is sometimes a similar disposition manifested in our churches, and laymen fail to speak the word of warning or encouragement to one in spiritual need. It is not, however, only to the clergyman, but to every earnest and sincere Christian that the promise of reward for such service is made:

Let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins (James 5: 20).

A Finger Sacrificed

In a recent speech on heroism displayed in scenes other than those of a battlefield, an incident is related of a railroad employe who displayed not only self-sacrifice, but singular presence of mind. The man was a

THE DETENTION PEN FOR IMMIGRANTS AT ELLIS ISLAND, NEW YORK

switchman at a station near Reading, Pa. While attending to his duty in the tower in which he was stationed, he had to move a certain switch to prevent a disastrous derailment. The action of the lever revealed to him that something was out of order, and hurrying to the switch, he found that a pivot bolt had dropped out and disappeared. The train was moving rapidly, and to save it, a substitute pivot was instantly and absolutely necessary. The switchman thrust his middle finger into the empty hole, signalled to a companion in the tower and the switch moved. Then he found him-

REJECTED IMMIGRANTS WHO WILL BE DEPORTED

self fastened tight, so close to the track that a second's delay meant his death beneath the advancing train. He did not delay—he gave one hard pull and walked away, leaving his finger behind him. The improvised pivot served the intended purpose, and the train passed safely. It was a dreadful alternative—that of losing his finger or his life, but he had the courage to choose the wiser course. Unhappily people are not always so heroic when it is a question of giving up some beloved habit, or some enjoyable association that is exposing the soul to peril, although Christ warns them of the consequences of not making the sacrifice.

If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell (Matt. 5: 30).

Obeved the Gong

Early pedestrians in New York on June 15 saw an amusing instance of animal fidelity to old habits. At the fire-engine station in Broome Street there was an alarm on the gong. The double doors were flung open, and in a minute the engine and tender emerged and went at a wild pace toward the Bowery to answer the call. A dejected-looking horse was across the street attached to a milk-wagon. At the first notes of the gong, he pricked up his ears and stood sniffing and trembling. As the engine passed him, he pawed the ground and in an instant started in pursuit. The man in charge vainly tried to check his speed. As the light wagon sped along, rocking violently, there was the crash of bottles and the clang of overturned tins, and the milk made a wide track along the street, but the horse held on his way, his nose touching the rear of the tender. Not until the engine had reached the scene of the fire did the horse stop, and then he stood perfectly still. It was easy to understand his feat. He was one of the superannuated horses that the Fire Department had sold, and the force of old habit still asserted itself. How well it would be, if the call to duty had a similar response from every Christian! When there are souls in need of spiritual help, their cry too often falls on deaf ears, and the help that should be given is not rendered.

No man cared for my soul (Ps. 142: 4).

A Heroic Engineer

A press dispatch from Providence, R. I., reports the daring rescue of a child by an heroic engineer. He was in charge of a passenger train on the Wrentham branch of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Road, and was speeding south, when he saw a child playing on the track. He knew that he could not stop the train in time to save the child, so he applied the brakes and ran along the footboard at the side of the boiler to the lowest point on the pilot. Getting a firm hold on the framework of the pilot with one hand, the engineer threw his body as far forward as possible, and, as the locomotive came upon the child playing between the rails, he lifted her from the track and carried her in safety to his cab. Everyone admires such a deed of heroism, and honors the man who would put his own life in peril to save that of a child; but how few there are who are moved by the story of One who actually gave his life to save sinners from going to eternal death.

Who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him (1. Thess. 5: 10).

BRIEF NOTES

Miss Jane Addams, the beloved head of the Hull House Settlement in Chicago, is to become LL.D., by grace of the University of Wisconsin.

Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander have begun revival services at Brighton, England. Their work at Bradford led to a very large number of conversions.

The Korean Emperor has ordered the expulsion of all sorcerers from the court, on the ground that they are the sole cause of all the trouble that has come to the nation.

The British Museum contains 1,750,000 books, not counting single sheets or parts of works that are accumulating. The shelving of the library exceeds sixty-nine miles in length.

There were thirty thousand delegates present at the recent Christian Endeavor Convention in London. A deputation of them had an audience with the King and Queen at Windsor Castle.

Miss Florence Nightingale the pioneer in the work of nursing soldiers wounded in war, recently celebrated her eighty-fourth birthday. It is fully fifty years since she served in the hospitals of the Crimean War. She still takes a strong interest in all enterprises of humanity and charity.

MODERN IDOLATRY

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

ISIS

JEROBOAM might have been great if he had not been wicked. He was brave, and so industrious and skillful a workman that King Solomon made him the superintendent of all the workmen of the tribe of Ephraim. God promised him promotion by the prophet Ahijah, who said to him that he should be king of the ten tribes of Israel. But the head and the heart of Jeroboam were both turned by prosperity. He lost sight of the fact that his kingdom rested upon God. He acted as if it rested upon the people; for no sooner was he made king than he began to scheme how he should keep the people loyal to him. And, strangely enough, he sought to establish their loyalty to him through disloyalty to God.

He did not dare to trust his people to go up to Jerusalem to worship God at the time of the great Passover, and other feasts, lest they should give back their allegiance to King Rehoboam. So Jeroboam built two other places of worship, and set up a golden calf in each for worship, saying: "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem." First in Dan, and then in Bethel he took upon himself the office of a priest, and offered sacrifices to the calf idol. The people followed his lead, and became idol worshippers. It is passing strange that they should have disregarded the fact that they must often have heard about, that their fathers had been punished for worshipping a golden calf, by the death of three thousand of them in one day (Exodus 32). God's eye was upon Jeroboam, and even while he was officiating as high priest of the calf a rebuke came to him through the prophet Ahijah, who told Jeroboam that the Lord was against him for what he had done, and that his kingdom should be cut off. And God caused the altar to break in pieces that Jeroboam had set up, and the fire and ashes in the altar fell out upon the ground. King Jeroboam was so angry with the prophet for rebuking him in the sight of the people—he was still thinking only of their loyalty to him—that he reached out his hand to strike the prophet. At once God stiffened his arm so that he could not move it, and he appealed to the prophet to call on God for help. God was merciful, and the arm was restored, but the heart of Jeroboam remained as stiff, and hard, and sinful as before. He was still disloyal to God, and went on teaching his people idolatry, in the hope and expectation that they would therefore be more loyal to him.

"And the days which Jeroboam reigned were two and twenty years, and he slept with his fathers." But his evil influence remained to make trouble for his country for many years.

Illustration and Application

This story bristles with practical lessons. First of all, in reviewing the revolt against unjust taxation that made Jeroboam king, we note that the sufferings of the people of Palestine from excessive taxation, which Solomon put upon them to support his wicked luxury, and which the publicans of New Testament times continued as the chief feature of Roman oppression, buying the privilege of collecting a tenth, and really extorting a fifth, are still continued by the Turks, as was strikingly proved when a delegate to the World's Sunday School Convention at Jerusalem last April, saw a Turkish officer compelling the leper beggars at the roadside to pay him a tax, which they dug out of their ragged clothes, amid flowing tears, with the stubs of arms, from which the fingers had dropped away. But let it not be overlooked that the heaviest tax burdens in our own land are the self-imposed taxes that our moral lepers put upon themselves for lust, and liquor, and gambling. There is a lesson for those critics in every age who are readier to condemn others than to correct themselves, in the fact that Jeroboam, chief critic of Rehoboam, for his arrogant unfaithfulness to his people, presently went himself one worse by unfaithfulness to his people and to God in the establishment of idolatry. This lesson may be further impressed by a modern story of a war-office clerk, who said to a fellow clerk: "Just look at that Government workman on the roof over the way. I've been watching the lazy beggar for half an hour, and he hasn't done a stroke of work. That's the way they cheat the Government." At the same time the workman was saying to his fellow workman: "Just look at that clerk down there. I've watched him half an hour, and he's done nothing but stare out of the window all the time. That's the sort of chap we have to pay taxes to keep."

*International S. S. lesson for July 10, on Jeroboam's Idolatry. Golden Text: "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." 1. John 5: 21.

Yet another lesson comes from the fact that Jeroboam, raised providentially from a lowly position, forgot to be grateful to God. At Munich, begging children are arrested, photographed in their rags, and then committed to a children's home, where they get clean clothes. And when the child has been educated and trained for a nobler life, as he goes forth, the picture taken in his beggary is given to him to keep, that he may also keep a warm feeling of gratitude for what has been done for him. There is also a story of a Persian vizier, the premier of his king, who devoted one room of his palace to memorials of his early days, before royal favor promoted him to his high estate. Jeroboam should have had such a picture in memory, such a chamber of memory, that he might not forget how God had raised him from a foreman among tribal workmen to the great opportunities of the throne. In short, the things we are proud of as if our own achievements, we should rather be grateful for as gifts from God.

The calves, which were no doubt set up, as idols always are at first, not as gods, but as symbols through which to worship God, suggest the danger in every age of allowing religious forms to hide instead of revealing God. Many persons, for example, are quite regular, and even particular, about receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, who show no signs that they really know the heart "communion" with God, of which it is a symbol. A young lady who manifestly sought first, not the kingdom of God, but selfish pleasure, to which she was as devoted as if it were her God, even giving many of her Sundays to pleasure, amazed her associates by refusing to go one Sunday because it was "communion day." They exclaimed in a surprise that should have cut her conscience to the quick: "Are you a communicant?"

And this brings up as another appropriate illustration of Jeroboam's calf worship, the cheap hypocrisy of those who excuse their Sunday excursions, in flat violation of God's law, in Isaiah 58: 14, that they can worship God in the mountains, and by the lakes, and in the woods. They can but they don't, and they know it. Those who use the "cant" about alldays being equally sacred, are the very ones who make no day sacred. "Nature worship" was the very thing the calves stood for, and it is as selfish and sinful to-day, as a substitute for obedience to God, as in the days of Jeroboam. And even going to meeting may become, no less than going to mass, a mere form, taking the place of practical Christian living, within and without, as the false basis of a hope of heaven, which recalls the story of a dog who went with his Presbyterian master to church, and slept regularly in front of the pulpit till the service was over. I master died, and a Baptist deacon became his master; when the family passed by the Presbyterian church the first Sunday, after a look of surprise and reproach, he went in his own church, "and remained faithful to the very end."

This lesson in idolatry may well be made a missionary lesson, an opportunity to show the suffering in this world that devil gods of terror bring to millions, with a practical home thrust at our own idolatrous propensity to give money or pleasure the first place in our own lives. Jeroboam's worship, like Aaron's, was borrowed from Egypt, where life was considered a part of God, and was therefore worshipped. The educated priests of Egypt, and Jeroboam also, would have said: "We do not make the calf a God, we worship God as life in this symbol of masculine life," the Museum of Egyptian antiquities, at Cairo, there is a room devoted to skeletons of sacred bulls, taken from immense stone coffins, too heavy to move, in the Serapeum, Memphis. When Cambyes invaded Egypt, then the mightiest of nations, he took advantage of their idolatry to conquer them. He armed his soldiers with crates full of sacred cats as cartridge boxes, and when the Egyptians saw that they could not kill their foes without killing their gods, they ran in terror, and surrendered their country to the invader; a significant instance of the great injury to nations as well as individuals that has been wrought by superstition from which Americans even are not wholly free. Harder better than calf worship is the talk about lucky and unlucky days, and numbers, and the consulting of clairvoyants and fortune-tellers, and the dependence for healing upon a gray spider, and the belief that has killed a beef, and the pocket potatoe, and horse chestnut.

But let us especially seek to deliver those countries in which such fears of devilish gods and hidden hoodoos cast a pall over nearly all the people day and night, making a present hell, which should have greater emphasis in our missionary talks, as interpreting the words of Jesus: "The Son of man is come to seek and save that which was lost." These people are "lost" already, every noblest thing about this life is "lost," and even if in some way we are sure they would have a chance to be saved in the future world, it would not lessen our duty to save the millions who need to be saved from the present hell of fear, and poverty, and tyranny, and lust.

The very worst idols are those whose worship is impurity, of which we can only hint. After Venus and Astarte and their successors, comes Kali, goddess of murder, whose special devotees are the thugs used to garrote men as pleasing sacrifices to this goddess, which is usually made much larger than a human form, painted blue, with a red tongue reeking with relished blood, and a necklace of skulls. In one hand she holds a severed head dripping blood, while another is being trampled to death beneath her feet. Thousands of mothers kill their girl babies as a sacrifice to Kali, and her worshippers often sacrifice their own blood by wounding themselves, sometimes cutting off parts of their own bodies. It is well for us to remember that if not love of blood, love of money has set up an evil in our own land that might well be necklaces of skulls. One of the most popular idols of to-day to be found in Rome is the church of the Bambino, meaning "the child to heaven," which is located on the Capitoline Hill. It is called "Santo Bambino," and is a figure hardly two feet high, carved out of wood from an olive tree in Gethsemane in the fifteenth century, to represent the infant Christ. It was solemnly crowned by the Vatican church on May 2, 1897. But little more than three years before that, in 1894, Pope Leo XIII. promulgated a prayer to be said in connection with the Bambino, which is repeated daily, would secure one hundred days of indulgence to souls in Purgatory. The figures herein given are taken from the back of a card which has on the front of it an elaborately colored picture of the Bambino.

TOTEM POLES

A BRAVE GIRL

By Margaret E. Sangster

GIRLS," said Dean Morgan, "I want you to know Miss Lucy Pease. She has just come to college all the way from Iowa, and I hope you will make her feel at home among us."

The Dean went into her office and closed the door. The group of girls in the corridor smiled on their new acquaintance, one of them saying pleasantly, "If you've ever been in Winstead before, I'll show you around Elmore Hall. There'll be time before supper. I expect you'll be at our table."

"I don't know," said Lucy Pease, "I'm to wait on the table. I'd much rather cook, but the Dean says there's no chance for that. You see I've to pay my own way."

"Lots of girls do," replied the one who had taken Miss Lucy Pease under her charge. She happened to be the daughter of a Senator, and the class beauty, with plenty of pocket-money and the distinction of a charming manner. Dean Morgan had observed Elsie Raimond in the company when she introduced Lucy, and had felt sure she would do the honors cordially. Elmore Hall prided itself on being democratic. A girl with brains, pluck and ordinary good health, could take care of herself in college if she chose.

"I am not a girl," said Lucy Pease quietly. "I am thirty-two years old. I took my entrance examinations here at Elmore fourteen years ago, before we all moved to Iowa, when father lost his money."

Elsie expressed no surprise. The social tact which was her father's special gift and which endeared him to wide constituency was hers also.

"If you haven't grown rusty in fourteen years and have kept up your studies at home, Miss Lucy, you are a wonder. How have you ever done it? They say the standard is raised every year. Why, my father and mother both tell me that when they went to college it was easy compared to what it is now."

"I have taken the examination again and have passed, with only one condition, that is in Greek prose," said Miss Lucy. "But it was harder work than hoeing corn or doing a day's washing."

"I believe you," and Elsie almost stared at the straight, small figure, with golden hair already powdered with gray, twisted into a tight little knob at the back of a large head. Lucy Pease was dressed in a skimpy black alpaca and her shoes were coarse. Her hands were mute witnesses of a life of toil. They were the hands of a woman who had done hard work. A wave of pity went over Elsie. At the same time she privately speculated on the motives that had induced Miss Lucy to come to college. One thing she noticed, that Miss Pease had a particularly sweet, soft voice, with liquid Southern intonations; the voice that belongs to open vowel sounds and slurred consonants. They walked together on the long veranda, and Elsie showed her companion the quarters of the rival literary associations, the Alpha Sigma and the Phi Kappa, and incidentally took her into her own cozy nest, the prettiest room in the Hall.

Lucy admired everything she saw. She had the air of one who has achieved something she had long striven for. The supper bell rung, and Dean Morgan coming toward the girls, said to Lucy: "Your duties will not begin for a day or two. Come in to tea."

Lucy Pease hung back. "I'd rather not eat with the crowd. I'd like to eat by myself," she murmured entreatingly in an aside to the astonished Dean. "Please, ma'am," she said, in the old-fashioned phrase that falls so sweetly from the Southern tongue, "Oh, please, ma'am, let me eat by myself or in the kitchen. I am not used to a crowd."

"Nonsense," replied the Dean, positively. "You'll not eat in the kitchen at any time; the waitresses have a table of their own in this dining-room. Elsie, you present Miss Pease to the teacher at your table, and see that she gets her supper in comfort."

The newcomer's pale face crimsoned, as she was seated between Elsie Raimond and another young girl, both trim and dainty in their white shirt waists and modish stocks. Suddenly she realized that she looked nearly old enough to be the mother of these gay girls; the arrogance of their youth oppressed her. She sat there, with her red and knobby hands, her homely dress, her tightly-knotted hair, self-conscious, and inclined to be hysterical. The room, with its many tables all surrounded by pretty girls, its hum of conversation, its merry clatter, almost whirled around her. Lucy Pease, in her embarrassment, put out her hand to clutch a glass of water, but her eyes were blurred. She upset the glass, and the water spilled and rippled in a stream over the white tablecloth. Without a word, she sprang up and fled from the dining-room, only to discover, in the bewilderment of a strange place, that she had lost her way, and could not find her own room.

She stepped out of an open door, and scarcely knowing whither she went, wandered over the campus, sinking at last upon a bench at the remotest corner of the grounds.

"WITHOUT A WORD, SHE SPRANG UP AND FLED FROM THE DINING ROOM"

"I may as well go back. I've come here fourteen years too late," she said, unaware that she was speaking aloud. She did not cry, but there was a lump in her throat, and her heart thumped in her breast. Then, all at once, her purpose that had been shining before her during the slowly passing years, rose up and challenged her.

"What," it cried, mockingly. "You'll give up, and go home and tell the neighbors that you were afraid of the girls, and didn't know how to behave in company. Lucy Pease, your mother'd be ashamed of you if she were alive and could see you. Didn't you always tell her you'd go to college yet; and now your pa's married again, and given you the chance, Lucy Pease! Lucy Pease!" said the inward voice, "I'm ashamed of you."

"Why, Lucy Pease!"

It was not the inward voice at all, but a familiar home-sounding voice that spoke her name; familiar, though she had not heard it for ten years. She looked up. Coming toward her over the green grass, under the yellowing maples, was a woman of the same type as herself, a woman, small, bent, bright-eyed.

"Miss Kezia! Did you call me?"

"To be sure I did. You didn't expect to find me here, Lucy, did you?"

"I might better say the same, Miss Kezia. You must be paralyzed at seeing me."

"Not at all. You told me a long time ago that you meant to go to college, and I knew you'd do it when you could. Why did you not come sooner?"

Lucy began her story, speaking in a colorless monotone. "When I was ready to enter college, Ma died. Then I had to take care of the other children. Pa said, wait two years till Milly is old enough to manage the house, and you can go. But Milly was so pretty and so delicate, I couldn't let her do hard work so soon, and by the time I felt I could, Jack Elderkin came along, and Milly was married to him before you could turn around. Then Paul wanted to go to college, and it was more important for him to go than for me. Besides, we were so dead poor that year Pa couldn't keep a hired man, and I worked in the fields as much as in the house."

"But Paul went?"

"Yes, Paul went to the State University. He graduated with honors after awhile, and he's a doctor now. Doing splendidly. I'm so proud of him."

"Then, tell me what came after Paul went?"

"The children kept on needing more and more things, and I couldn't be spared from home. I just couldn't desert my father. I studied nights and mornings, and tried not to forget a single thing. When Cousin Luther died and left me two thousand dollars, I thought I'd come then, and hire help for father. I'd never been so situated that I could hire help till that time. But father was dreadfully down-hearted, for the farm was mortgaged, and beside he wanted to buy more land. He allowed it was selfish in me to use that money on an education; bein' a woman, and not likely to marry, he thought I might better set the home free. So I did. And then, Miss Kezia, Pa met a lady he could love, and he was married last June, and I've come away."

"Did they want you to come away?" asked Miss Kezia in a queer voice, a little choked.

"No, they wanted me to stay and do the work. Mrs. Pease isn't very strong; but I thought mother'd say, I'd done my share, so here I am, and I'm to pay my way mostly by what I can do to help along, if the Dean'll let me stay. It's nice to see an old friend, Miss Kezia."

"Come back to the house and have tea with me, Lucy. You know I'm a teacher here, don't you? Oh, here's Elsie Raimond looking for you."

"I've carried your supper to your room," said Elsie. "You weren't there, and I've been hunting for you for the last fifteen minutes."

"I couldn't find my room."

"It is puzzling, so many rooms, isn't it, Miss Kezia?" said Elsie consolingly. "But don't worry. A night's rest will set you up, and the Dean sent word you could be excused from chapel this evening."

It is never quite simple for a woman past thirty to fit into a niche among schoolgirls, as one of them. She is so much farther on the road. Even if she feels as they do, if she is as young as they, under her mask, they do not understand it and shut her out. Kezia, hovering over Lucy with motherly touches until she was safe in bed, knew more about the future than Lucy could dream, seeing it in the light of her own past. She went to the Dean with a petition.

"Lucy Pease is a heroine!" she began.

"Indeed! Well, that may be, but she has the soul of a mouse, my dear!"

"If you had that thought, why did you encourage her to try this uphill task?"

"Because I am soft-hearted. When I set the difficulties before her, she was resolute; when I said I thought there was no room for even one more self-supporting student this year, her eyes filled with tears and she looked as though she would die on the spot. She told me she had walked a good deal of the way from Iowa to Wisconsin. She didn't mind it in pleasant weather!"

"I knew her years ago. I was the minister's sister in the place where she lived. Lucy Pease is the most unselfish woman in the world, and she loves books as a miser loves gold. She's never had a chance. I want her to have one now. But she'll not succeed in waiting on the table. Let her try cooking."

"It's harder; and what can she do?"

"She can make bread that won't be sour or soggy. Let her try her hand there."

It was so arranged. The girls saw little of the shy student, whose loaves and biscuits were like puffs of snow, and who was seldom seen outside of her classes. She roomed alone, and joined in none of the games and festivities. It was wonderful how well she did her work, tossing it off as if it were play, and expanding with the joy of it. The class grew proud of her. She was its ornament, and did "stunts" that nobody else attempted. But she kept aloof from society, stole in and out of chapel like a shadow, and made bread day by day, the like of which Elmore Hall had never tasted.

Lucy's people had come from Mississippi, and as her father belonged to the contingent who never got on, they had known a good many changes. Her childhood in Wisconsin had been brightened by the visits of Southern cousins, beautiful, graceful girls and gallant, high-bred men, who satisfied the poetry of her nature, and gave her noble ideals, which the shy, reserved child kept to herself. Only her mother read her aright, and only she understood Lucy's hunger and thirst for an education. She told her, with almost her last breath, "Daughter, be firm. Carry out your plans." After the family went to Iowa, and the mother died, the Southern cousins ceased to come, though cousin Luther always wrote periodically to the little girl to whom he later left a legacy. In the Iowa home poverty had been the rule and ease the exception, so Lucy had learned every sort of household work, and of society she had known little, the minister's wife and sister being the only ones who sought her out and tried to help her in her daily tasks. It made Elmore Hall home for her at once when she found Miss Kezia there.

Lucy Pease could not afford to go home for holidays. When the spring vacation came, and most of the students hurried away to their homes, she, with a few others, remained. The great building with its many rooms, at this time had its annual cleaning. Lucy went to the matron.

"Couldn't I help clean house, Mrs. Somers?"

The matron looked at her. The small, erect figure was slight but strong, with muscles like whipcord.

"There is scrubbing to do, Miss Pease, and there's cleaning paint, and washing windows, and I need another woman very much. The pay is a dollar a day. But the women I've engaged are colored. You might not wish to work with them."

Lucy smiled. "I won't mind them, if they don't mind me, Mrs. Somers." And she earned her dollar a day. There was good stuff in Lucy Pease. She felt that a gentlewoman cannot demean herself by honest work. The colored women treated her as if she were a princess gone astray, and they were aghast at her undertaking to scrub and scour, but did their own work better for seeing how well she did hers. As for the few girls who were staying over the holiday, they vied with each other in paying Lucy little attentions. One of them said, "She'll be somebody yet, and we'll be telling people we were in college with her when she washed windows and took Latin prizes in the same year."

Yet, but for an accident they never would have known the real Lucy at Elmore. The midsummer term was nearly over, and the whole college in the throes of the annual final exams, when Elsie Raimond was taken down with scarlet fever, and had to be quarantined. It was a peculiarly malignant variety of the disease. Her parents had gone abroad, and there was not a trained nurse in Winsted.

The doctor was about to telegraph to Cincinnati for one, when a quiet little figure in a print gown and white apron stood at his elbow.

"Let me nurse her, doctor, please let me. I know as much about nursing as any hospital nurse you can get. I'm here, and I'm not afraid of the fever. I pulled six brothers and sisters through it one year."

"I ought to tell you, if you are connected with the college," said the physician, looking keenly into the alert, eager face, and at once giving this woman his confidence, "that this will be a long illness, and likely a slow convalescence. If you are a student, you may miss a good deal of time, maybe you'll miss a year."

"Never mind that, doctor. I waited a good while before I came, and I'm not afraid of a tough job. Let me nurse Elsie. I want to, because she is so pretty."

She won her point. In the fierce battle that followed, she watched, and struggled, and fought as only the born nurse can. She put aside her ambition, her books, her hope to graduate, and took care of Elsie Raimond, and Elsie Raimond recovered, thanks to the Lord and Lucy Pease.

"You called that girl a heroine," said the Dean to Miss Kezia, "and I doubted you. Now I call her a saint."

The years drifted by as years do. When the day came on which Elsie Raimond and Lucy Pease were graduated, Lucy gave the valedictory. No one of the whole class had so many bouquets. No one so much applause. The quiet little woman was the most popular member of the class.

"I'm coming back," she said happily, to the Dean, "after my vacation is over, to see if you haven't some steady work for me, if it is only bread-making. I would like to spend the rest of my life here, and I will if I can."

Even as she spoke, a letter was placed in her hand. It was from home. "Come back, Lucy," wrote her father, "come as quick as ever you can. Your ma has had a stroke. We want you."

So she went back and carried sunshine to the invalid and the worried father. But later on, when God made the way plain, Lucy did return to the college she loved, and married a gray-haired professor, and became the guardian genius of many young girls.

IN NATURE'S GARDEN

SEE COLORED ILLUSTRATION ON FRONT PAGE

I LOOKED where the roses were blooming,
They stood among grasses and weeds;
I said, "Where such beauties are growing,
Why suffer these paltry weeds?"

Weeping, the poor things faltered:
"We have neither beauty nor bloom,
We are grass in the roses' garden,
But the Master gives us room."

"Slaves of a generous Master,
Born from a world above,
We came to this place in his wisdom,
We stay to this hour from his love."

"We have fed his humblest creatures,
We have served Him truly and long;
He gave no grace to our features,
We have neither color nor song."

"Yet He who has made the flowers,
Placed us on the self same sod;
He knows our reason for being,—
We are grass in the garden of God."

Our Royal Guest From China

WHILE the United States has, at various times, been visited by distinguished members of royalty from Europe, yet a high prince of true imperial blood and lineage from the Orient has very seldom visited our land. Within the last few weeks, the United States has been honored by a visit from Prince Pu Lun, nephew of the reigning emperor of China, accompanied by his uncle, the emperor's brother, the prince of

Owing to the Russo-Japanese war, and the peculiar relations the Chinese Empire bears to the belligerents, the coming of Prince Pu Lun is a matter of much international significance. The Prince is about thirty years of age, of medium height, and the first Imperial Prince of China to present his royal uncle, the reigning Emperor of the Dragon Empire, at a foreign Exposition, or any other international function. He is a very clever botanist, and a well-read student of history. Only a few months ago, Pu Lun was suddenly made to realize his deficiency in the knowledge of English, and proceeded to instruct himself; but he found his time too short to permit him to master the language. He, however, learned to write his name in English, and apparently delights in inscribing it beneath the Chinese characters that designate his lofty rank in the royal family of Peking. He does not speak English, but his interpreter and tutor, Wong Kai Kah, is a master of English and a ripe scholar.

On the Prince's arrival at San Francisco, a reception committee, headed by the Chinese Consul-General Chung Pao Shi, met him. Before he left for St. Louis, he was given a number of public receptions and shown distinguished honors. All Chinese town was ablaze with dragon flags and countless yellow streamers, and San Francisco's Chinese residents united in making extravagant, patriotic demonstrations in his honor. Prince Pu Lun is a very quiet, unassuming youth. The photograph shows him without his brilliant and rich robes of office—just in plain, every-day attire. When dressed in the full robes of state, the Prince wears a coat of yellow satin, and trousers of deep, gorgeous purple. From his cap depends the royal peacock feather, with the three great diamond eyes. On his left breast is pinned a magnificent jeweled badge, representing the "First Order of the Rising Sun." The visiting prince from the Orient will only make a short stay in this country.

The Future of Manchuria

UNITED STATES Consul Miller, of New Chwang, thus writes of Manchuria, the present battle ground of Japan and Russia, in the Geographic Magazine:

The year 1903 was the best that Manchuria has ever known as to its production. Crops were unusually good, and prices were also good. Both Manchuria and Mongolia are marvelously rich, and, under a good government, with transportation provided and its other and mineral wealth developed and added to its agricultural resources, Manchuria will prove one of the greatest markets for United States goods.

Notwithstanding wars, the country continues to grow in productiveness and commerce. Its people are largely industrious, capable, and need only an enterprising, substantial and honest government to insure them great prosperity.

Manchuria is not yet thickly populated, its farms are mostly in large tracts of 100 to 200 acres, and even more. The great commercial development has come as a result of its agricultural development and the settlement of the country by agricultural people from other parts of China.

"Although the country is extremely rich in minerals, including coal, iron, copper, silver, gold, and other kinds, these have only been worked in a small and crude way by the natives. When the mineral wealth is developed and worked by modern methods in a manner fitting its economic possibilities, Manchuria will prove to be one of the richest sections of Asia.

"It has the happy combination of a splendid variety and vast quantities of minerals, valuable forests, great agricultural wealth, and an industrious, capable people, whose labor is, perhaps, the best in the world for its cost. In addition, it has good waterways and easy grades and a country in which railway construction and operation is very economical. All of these advantages are combined with a healthy, invigorating climate, where crops never fail."

Most Enjoyable of its Kind

I have read Harry Steele Morrison's story and to the family, and to say that we have thoroughly enjoyed it is to put it mildly. It is instructive, as well as interesting. We never enjoyed a book of that kind so much before."

Mina Dorman.

Worth far More than its Price

"How I Worked My Way Around the World is indeed the most interesting and instructive book I ever read. It shows what perseverance and integrity may accomplish. The price is no comparison to the value of its contents."

veiled by a reflection of the thoughts within. Decades and scores of years were lived o'er again in those few minutes, and nearer to his God felt every being in that room.

"Oh, I can stand this no longer!" The wail came from a youth, who rose from among his fellows and staggered to the door. He did not get beyond it. I need not tell you the story he told me. A variation of that discordant theme, moaned and groaned by the many along the highway of the wicked. He is home now; the splendid son of a splendid mother and a worker among the weeds. Had it not been for that song, we would have never met, which I would have regretted, for he is a true man, who had turned the wrong corner and had landed in a dirty alley.

All this is an old story. That blessed old tune is responsible for having steered many wandering boys home again, and it is a good proof of my assertions that our hymns could be greater factors in the work. If the great multitude can memorize the ever-increasing "popular songs of the day," and their inane rhymes, with marvelous exactitude, why can we not do better in our beautiful hymns?

I do not claim to be a critic of poetic effusions, but the words of most of our hymns are very full of meaning in their unpretentious metres, to my humble mind.

Tell me the old, old story,
Of unseen things above,
Of Jesus and his glory,
Of Jesus and his love,
Tell me the story simply,
As to a little child,
For I am weak and weary,
And helpless and defiled.

Yes, we all can sing it, but, just for a test, how many of us can recite it? And is it not worth memorizing? Sing that hymn, reading every word of it, and it will come fuller from your throat.

I do not wish to force my taste and judgment upon you, but I would like to submit to you whether a hymn, with the words of the following should not be sung as if we meant it:

Brightly beams our Father's mercy
From his lighthouse evermore,
But to us he gives the keeping
Of the lights along the shore.
Let the lower lights be burning.
Send a gleam across the wave.
Some poor fainting, struggling seaman
You may rescue, you may save.

As I see it, there is divinely inspired poetry in that verse. Is it not true, that imagery of the writer? Is not "this lighthouse brightly beaming," and have we not the "keeping of the lights along the shore?"

Take any hymn-book, glance through it, and you will be surprised at the nobleness and purity of the verses. Is it then just to the men and women who have put their best inspirations into rhyme, to sing their words without a true appreciation of their meaning? Perhaps I am wrong in assuming all this, and to convince myself, I shall ask the very next professing Christian I meet to recite the Doxology to me. Let me suggest to you to do likewise, and you may find a few surprises awaiting you.

So, taking the merit of the hymns as an accepted fact, you should not undervalue their effect on a crowd of sinners. I know that the song part of the services is the real magnet for many of the men. Their lives are stripped bare of everything refining and beautiful, and we all know that in every heart a little corner is reserved for the beautiful things of life. Some like pictures, or stately buildings, or flowers, or even beautiful animals, and a great majority like music.

I have sat among crowds of weary, disheartened men, but with the intonation of that grand battle hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," there came a straightening of backbones and a braver flicker into bleary eyes.

Let me ask you, in the name of my brethren of the highway of the foolish and wicked, to sing your hymns as you have never sung them before, and to make every word in them tell. You will do both, give pleasure and prepare the soil.

Speaking of the beautiful things, you would be surprised could you see, as I have seen, how very little it takes to make life brighter for those still in darkness.

To have emanated from the slums does not oblige me to forget them, and I have an afternoon of every week to spare to visit those still down there. My means do not permit me to be too lavish, and, beyond a small stipend furnished to me weekly by some unknown friend, I do not care to become the dispenser of funds contributed by others. Better equipped agencies than I am organized for that purpose.

During the holidays, I set myself to having a lot of has-beens scrubbed. Verily, they needed it. And I believe that a clean body is the first step to righteousness.

Marching to the baths with my gallant band, we passed a notion store. Job lots of slightly shopworn Christmas cards were displayed in the window. While my fellows scrubbed and splashed, I could not stop my thoughts from reverting to those cards. My brigade cleansed and discharged, I went to the store and bought twenty-five cents' worth of those cards. I told the dealer what I intended to do with them, and he doubled the amount, until I had quite a goodly lot of finely and weirdly tinted miniature works of art in my pockets. The very first little chit of a girl repaid me. The grimy little fingers closed over the card, and yet, carefully, instinct emphasizing the contrast between her filth and the beauty of the bit of pasteboard. Out of twenty-five children, only three preferred the offered penny to the card.

I tell you I felt good that day, and remembered that when I was a kid I had often longed for something bright and beautiful, but nobody ever—but that is an entirely different story.

What did my kiddies care for your Raphaels and Messoniers? Had they not green and blue and red cards, which, honestly and truly, "belonged" to them?

Do you think they entirely outgrew all this in the years to come? Take a peep into some of the "single rooms" of the lodging-houses, and you will find little bits of bright things and "cut out pictures" stuck to the wooden partitions. The Master made the beautiful things and gave us the longing for them. We must not stifle it.

Looking back at my "whence," I can understand the hardness of the work among the unfortunates. It is disheartening labor to drill through the accumulated layers of callousness, so disheartening that the callousness sometimes, although rarely, becomes infectious. But look at the reward! Not only the one above, but the one right here! To see a smile creep over a wan little face at your gift of something bright, to note your words finding a grasp in some besoddened mind, to lead the hymn with a responsive enthusiasm, ah, it is great reward. And it all can be made the means to

For days after the disaster, the Morgue was thronged by those who came to identify the dead. In that time there were over 30,000 visitors. The bodies lay in hastily rows. There were many exciting scenes. Some of the visitors fainted on seeing their lost ones; others wholly lost their reason and were led away raving maniacs. Several women, on finding their dead, became violent and attempted to kill themselves, crying, "Let us die too! Why should we live?" A man who had lost his wife and children, after he had visited the Morgue and hospitals in vain, went home and took his own life. Another disaffected husband lost his wife and eight children. One fine-looking young man who had gone on the excursion with his betrothed, found the girl's body. His grief was pitiful.

Of course, there will be an official investigation of the disaster, and an effort will be made to fix the responsibility. There are many severe criticisms on the action of Captain Van Schaick in running the burning steamer two miles, when he might have made a landing much sooner and thus probably have saved many lives. Some men say he could have beached the Slocum on a course a mile shorter than the one he took. Mayor McClellan and several other city officials visited the pier and the morgue on Thursday, June 10th, and were stunned at the extent of the calamity. The Mayor afterwards addressed a letter of condolence to Pastor Haas, of St. Mark's Lutheran Church, expressing the deepest sympathy with his people in their affliction.

At the Church of St. Mark's, an information bureau was opened for the benefit of the crowds of inquirers who kept coming to ask for news of the missing, and bulletins were posted outside. The pastor was utterly prostrated by the disaster which has swept away a large part of his flock and his own family. In scores of churches the disaster was the subject of special prayer at the Wednesday prayer meetings.

Divers began work on the wreck of the Slocum at North Brother Island the day after the fire. The wreck soon began to break up. North Brother Island looked like a battlefield. Swollen bodies from the river and charred and disfigured corpses from the steamer lay on the shore, their faces covered by white cloths. By Thursday night, many mangled bodies had been taken out of the wreck, and the death-roll was steadily increasing. It was estimated that from 800 to 1,000 had perished, either by burning or drowning; 562 bodies had been found by Friday noon, of which 521 had been identified, and 448 were still missing; some of those, it was hoped, would turn up alive. It was proposed to explode dynamite to force the East River to give up its dead.

Investigation shows that the General Slocum, one of the largest and most popular of New York's excursion fleet, was wretchedly equipped for any dangerous emergency. Many of her life preservers were rotten and would not float. The fire hose, too, is alleged to have been rotten, and to have burst when an attempt was made to use it in checking the fire. The life-boats were rendered useless almost as soon as the flames got under headway. There was no attempt to utilize the fire-drill, at which the crew should have been expert. It was charged, too, that there was an absolute lack of discipline at a time when it might have done much toward saving life. All these and other equally serious allegations, will be sifted during the official inquiry.

Capt. Van Schaick, shortly after the disaster, made a statement, while tears rolled down his face. He said, brokenly:

"I did the best I could. I ordered Van Wart to beach her, and we started for shore at 134th Street. But the shore there is lined with rocks, and I was afraid we'd founder. There the captain of a tug warned me off. He shouted that the steamer would set fire to the oil tanks and the lumber. Then we started for North Brother Island.

"Flames came up on the port side first, and then on the starboard side. We put her on the beach four or five minutes later.

"Flames were all around us then. We had to close the windows of the pilot-house to keep them off. And then we had to run for it. My clothes were burning. The hat was burned off my head.

"Van Wart and Weaver got off ahead of me. I jumped through the flames on the starboard side. I hit the bottom, and hurt my leg. Some nurse helped me on the bank, and then the dominie grabbed me. 'Thank God, you're safe,' he said.

"I can't tell you how it happened. I superintended building the Slocum. I've been in command of her thirteen years on the 25th of this month. All the old women and men I took out to-day have known me for years. I've taken them out many, many years."

While many of the victims were of the poorer class, it is evident that there were many well-to-do on the ill-fated steamer. In the coroner's hands are jewels, watches, rings, diamonds, necklaces, earrings, bracelets, brooches and pins, roughly valued at $150,000, awaiting owners. These belonged to the dead.

The unidentified dead were buried in the Lutheran Cemetery at Middle Village, N. Y.

There is a feeling of universal sympathy for the survivors. With the view of aiding the needy ones, the Mayor of New York has formed a relief committee to take charge of contributions. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has forwarded $100 to the relief fund.

Progress of the War in the Far East

A SHARP engagement occurred between 3,000 Russians and a smaller force of Japanese, on June 11th, in the Jungyo Mountains, near Tschichao. The Japanese made a feint of retreating, and drew the Russians into a trap near Yaotung Pass, where they were attacked by a superior force, and 800 killed or wounded. The Russians retreated in disorder.

Admiral Skrydloff recently sallied out from Vladivostok with the Russian squadron of battleships and cruisers, and began to harass Japanese vessels in the Korean Gulf. The fleet encountered three Japanese transports—the Hitachi, the Sado, and a third, the Idami, which escaped in safety. The others were attacked by the Russian warships, and the Hitachi was sunk by the fire of one of the cruisers. The slaughter was terrible. The Sado was also attacked and fired upon. Her crew took to the boats, but returned to the vessel, as the enemy withdrew suddenly. About a thousand lives were lost. The Tokio press charges that the Russians fired upon drowning men.

It is said the Czar has expressed his determination to sacrifice a million men, if necessary, to defeat Japan.

Gen. Stakelberg, with a Russian force for the relief of Port Arthur, was completely routed by three Japanese divisions, part of the army of Gen. Oku, at Wafangow, one hundred miles north of Kinchow. The Russians lost all their guns and some 300 prisoners and 1,000 dead and wounded. The Japanese losses were also severe. It is reported that Gen. Kuroki may attempt to block the retreat of Stakelberg's forces, and thus compel their surrender, shutting them up between his own army and that of Gen. Oku.

The Use of Borden's

Eagle Brand Condensed Milk insures strong, healthy children, as reputable physicians testify. Those who use it for their babies are spared the dangerous disorders of infantile digestion; their children mature as they should in weight, size and health. Beware of unknown brands.

THE HEALTH THAT COMES WITH ESKAY'S FOOD IS LASTING HEALTH BABES FED UPON IT GROW INTO STRONG AND STURDY CHILDREN

This is Carl Vogt of Rochester, N. Y., at the age of 16 months, and again as he now looks at three years. He was fed from birth on ESKAY'S FOOD and was the third of his family to be raised upon it. He has never known a day's illness and is an exceptionally strong and vigorous child.

ESKAY'S FOOD modifies cow's milk by making the curds soft and digestible, just as they are in mother's milk. When it is added to milk it assures perfect nourishment, because it supplies the tissue building element and the heat and energy producing element. No other Food is like it, or compares with it. No stomach is too weak to retain it, no baby so poorly nourished, so ill or sickly as not to be helped by it. Babies fed upon it are unusually free from hot-weather troubles.

A prominent physician of Washington, D. C., writes about ESKAY'S FOOD as follows:

"Since the introduction of your ESKAY'S ALBUMINIZED FOOD I have used it almost to the exclusion of all other infant Foods. I have never deserted it and I have not immediately returned to ESKAY'S, which I regard as superior for infants to all other Foods. In an experience of twenty years I have not to find an infant with which it has disagreed. I am now using it with my own child with excellent results."

If your baby is ill or poorly nourished, and if you would like to try ESKAY'S FOOD, we will send you a generous trial sample, together with our book, "How to Care for the Baby," free on request.

are to be considered in purchasing a memorial:

"LEST WE FORGET"

1. Durability

A monument should last as long as the life it commemorates, and be a lasting reminder of the one it honors.

2. Artistic Beauty

When you have a monument, you want it to be a work of art, and to be a fitting tribute to the one it honors.

RUSSIA AS IT IS TO-DAY

Political, Commercial, Social and Religious Conditions in European and Asiatic Russia

HOW little is generally known about the vast empire which holds and governs so large a part of Europe and Asia, will be realized by every reader of Geoffrey Drage's comprehensive and exhaustive work on Russian Affairs, just issued by E. P. Dutton & Co., of New York. Mr. Drage had exceptional opportunities of producing such a work, in having been a student at the University of Moscow, and in having traveled during the past twenty years over much of European and Asiatic Russia. He has evidently been a close and careful observer, and has studied closely the social, political and commercial conditions of the people. He must also have had access to authoritative statistics, which he quotes as the basis of his philosophical reflections, and has grouped with remarkable skill.

Though, as an Englishman, Mr. Drage might have been expected to take a hostile view of the traditional enemy of his own country, his comments are fair and he is economical of them, evidently desiring to present facts and give information of actual conditions, rather than to criticize, or excite prejudice. His book, therefore, is exceptionally valuable, and will doubtless be used as a text-book by all students of European civilization, who have long needed such a work on this particular branch of the subject. Mr. Drage had completed his book before the outbreak of Russia's war with Japan, but he apparently foresaw the possibility of the conflict. His chapter on Russian rule in Manchuria, and her movements in Korea, have therefore now enhanced value in the light of recent events.

The motto Mr. Drage puts on his title page is Count Mouravieff's statement of Russian belief in the destiny of the Russian people, which is one of the most astonishing things in the book. It is so directly contrary to the general opinion that Americans hold of the Russian nation, as being, with the exception of the higher nobility, in need of being taught and civilized, rather than of teaching and leading the rest of the world. Count Mouravieff says: "I believe that Russia has a civilizing mission such as no other people in the world, not only in Asia, but also in Europe. . . . We Russians bear upon our shoulders the new age; we come to relieve the tired men." The idea of Russia civilizing Europe is somewhat ludicrous, in view of the tremendous work she has yet to do within her own boundaries, besides that needing to be done in the dependencies she has acquired during the past century.

It is an instructive survey that Mr. Drage makes of Russian history from the accession of Alexander I, in 1801, to the present time. It is a story of alternate liberalism and reaction, the concessions of one monarch minimized and curtailed by his successor. It is pitiful to read of the large-minded reforms conceived and executed by Alexander II, which aroused so much hope and enthusiasm among the intelligent patriots of the country, being neutralized and rendered abortive by the bureaucracy that surrounded his son, and which still exercises power in spite of the liberalism of his grandson. As an illustration of its might, Mr. Drage quotes the instance of the recent treatment of Finland. He says:

The most reactionary event in the annals of modern Russia is the abrogation of the constitution of Finland, by which act the Czar has thrown away the love and loyalty of a nation. . . . No shadow of disaffection had ever fallen on Finland; no excuse could be found in the condition of the country, which was the one contented and prosperous part of the Czar's dominions; but the atrocious measure was carried out all the same, the real reason being the hatred of freedom entertained in the bureaucratic and military circles in Russia.

The present condition of the Russian people is, in our author's opinion, one of the most dangerous in modern history. "The patience of the Russian people," he says, "is now strained to the breaking point; and the inevitable change, which, though it may still be delayed, has never seemed so near, will, if not made from above with a good grace, be surely accompanied by an outburst from below, exceeding in horror anything that history records of the French Revolution."

Some of the most remarkable statistics quoted are those that refer to education.

There is no uniform system of education. Schools are established by different Government Departments, by local bodies, and by private effort, but the general control of schools, when established, is placed under the Ministry of Public Instruction. In the schools established by the Synod, instruction is confined to the Russian and old Slavonic alphabets, the church catechism, and the rudiments of arithmetic. Schools are few in number, and staffed with teachers whose annual salary averages about $30. The number of children receiving elementary instruction in schools of all kinds during 1898, the latest year for which statistics are available, was 4,200,000. This implies that only a little more than a quarter of the population of school age receive instruction of any kind. In Great Russia, at the present time, the proportion of illiterates among the adult population is ninety-four per cent. The ignorance which prevails permits superstition of every kind to flourish among the peasantry. Belief in magic, possession and the power of spirits, is general, and often produces acts of cruelty toward the supposed victims of demoniacal possession.

The great preponderance of the Russian people are engaged in agriculture. Of the whole number of adults constituting the working class in Russia proper, estimated at 35,700,000, no less than 29,000,000 cultivate the soil; 2,000,000 are engaged in the lumber industry; 1,000,000 in hunting and fishing, and about 1,000,000 in the rearing of sheep, horses, etc. Thus ninety-two persons in every hundred of the working class are engaged in rural pursuits. The industries so far developed are those of cotton manufacture, woolen goods, linen goods, coal and iron, naphtha, sugar refining, and the manufacture of arms.

The Russian persecution of the Jews has of late years been the subject of world-wide interest. Mr. Drage estimates the number of Jews in Russia proper at 3,500,000. The greater number of occupations are absolutely closed to them. They may not be employed on railroads nor in railroad construction. They must perform military service, but can never rise from the ranks. They are also restricted in education. The law limits the admission of entrance to public middle schools, in which the proportion of Jewish to Christian children must never be more than five to ten per cent., and in the higher schools from three to five per cent, and in the universities, two per cent.

From 1887 to 1890 all Jews resident in rural districts were harried from their homes and forced into the Pale. . . . Deprived of every means of livelihood, and crowded in the cities of the Pale, the Jews quickly showed signs of deterioration. Many died of starvation. Men who were enrolled as artisans to pursue the vocation of watchmakers were expelled because they had sold watchkeys. . . . Tailors were expelled because the buttons which were sold on the clothes were not manufactured by them. "The Russian persecution," says Mr. Lecky, "stands apart from the other forms of the anti-Semitic movement, on account of its unparalleled magnitude and ferocity, and also because it is the direct act of a government, deliberately, systematically, remorselessly, seeking to reduce to utter misery millions of its own subjects."

Mr. Drage has separate chapters on Siberia, Poland, Finland, Manchuria, Turkestan, etc., and their people, administration, and general conditions, all of which are full of interesting facts, which must be new to many readers.

June Sunrise at Mont-Lawn

ANYTHING more beautiful than an early morning in June at Mont-Lawn would be difficult to imagine. The view from the Hudson is superb from the balcony of the main building, while back, and at the right, stand old Rockland's green hills, arching around in a semicircle or crescent, as if to protect this Home for little children from the north winds, and bringing into beautiful contrast the blue sky and water.

Life awakens to new glory on these beautiful summer mornings. At the first break of day the robins and their feathered kin begin to peep and chirp, but the glad song of the latter day, but a sort of sleepy, comfortable twitter, as if the silence of the dawn must not be broken too hurriedly. A thin, silvery mist, like a gray veil of finest mossamer, is spread over river, valley, and rest, which gently melts and disappears; the sun arises from his gorgeous eastern couch. The trees, all a-glitter from the last night's shower, take on a most vivid green. The roses raise their drooping, sleepy heads: the very grass springs anew; while daisies, clover, and "black-red-Susans"—the latter like an army of ants in miniature—arise, to greet the living of day. The river sparkles and mirrors the morning beams, reproducing their golden glory in a thousand glittering waves, and, back of all—the grandeur of the everlasting hills.

O Rockland hills, all glory crowned,
And covered o'er with green,
Ye stand like sentinels around
To guard the beauteous scene.
Upward ye lift your towering heads,
Like giant monks at prayer,
While God's blue sky its glory sheds
Around you everywhere.

To this lovely place soon will come the sad children of the tenements, trooping to the broad, smooth roadway, two hundred at a time, to spend a joyful ten days. Here they may run and romp to their heart's content, and here they are taught by careful, loving friends, that it is all the gift of a dear Heavenly Father, who has put into the hearts of the generous people to provide these lovely things for them.

Miss Collins, the Superintendent of the Home, says that it is wonderful what a spirit of comradeship and how little quarreling there is among the children. "They are all too busy and happy for ill-natured feelings, and there is so much room for them to play, they seem to have no inclination to disagree. And they are so pleased with their new clothes," she added. "We provide many of them with a complete outfit from clothing sent us, for which we are very grateful."

Miss Collins told the writer a touching story of a little boy, who was in a ragged and miserable condition when he came to the Home. He was a fine little fellow of about four years, with large, blue eyes and yellow, curly hair. He came in charge of an elder brother, who was very careful of "Dickey." The good Superintendent, struck with the sweet, gentle face of the yellow-haired baby, took him upstairs, where she had in safe-keeping some clothing which had been contributed by a mother who had lost her little boy—a full suit of black velvet, ruffled shirt, and patent leather shoes. She brushed his wavy locks until they shone like gold.

"Oh, such a picture as that child made!" said she. "You would not have believed such a change possible. I took him down-stairs to his brother, who ran to him exclaiming delightedly, 'O Dickey! O Dickey!' And poor little Dickey fell in a dead faint at his brother's feet. The doctor was called. 'Over-excitement,' he said, 'that is all; nothing serious,' and that was all."

Children's clothing may be sent to the Matron at our Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson. Gifts to the Fresh Air fund may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, N. Y.

IGNORING GOD

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN men work out things in their own hearts, without taking any counsel from God, it is very evident where their confidence is placed. They are suspicious of God, either that he cannot, or that he will not, take up their cause and carry it through. Most people have so little confidence in God that they think it a great risk to place things in his hands; they believe it is contrary to common sense. It would be so if God were an idol; we do not wonder at heathen sceptics. But there are devoted heathen who trust their false gods far more than so-called Christians venture to trust the God who made them, and who holds their souls in life to this day. Our wisdom, if we are God's children, is to look invariably at God's side of everything. Let us deal with God as One who is absolutely to be trusted, and who is responsible for all the results of our obedience to him; and life is wonderfully simplified; anxiety goes out of it.

We are not told who were the counsellors of King Jeroboam, who advised him to set up idols, but from the result we can see that the counsel given was not from above, but from beneath. It resulted in his making two golden calves, one in Dan, the frontier of Syria; and the other in Bethel, the frontier of Judah. The golden calves were no doubt an imitation of the herubim on the ark, so that the people who were not spiritual, might easily be induced to believe that they were, in a way, worshiping the God of Israel, while their religion demanded no more obedience to the holy law of God than that of heathen around them. This was abomination in the sight of God; it was the beginning of a national departure from him, and he speaks of it as "the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin" (I. Kings 15: 34; 16: 19).

God did not leave Jeroboam without warning, for his own sake and for the sake of the people. But Jeroboam would not recognize this as a message from God; he would deal only with the prophet, he would treat him as being guilty of high treason and apprehend him. So he put forth his hand from the altar and gave command, "Lay hold on him." But God in very mercy gave him an indubitable sign in his own person; the hand which he had stretched out against God's messenger remained stationary and dried up. He and his false prophets and idolatrous people must be convinced that the true God had spoken. And now the stricken king must humble himself to seek a favor of the God against whom he had sinned. But he could not bring himself to urge his own petition, he must get the man of God to pray for him.

Why did not Jeroboam himself pray for healing when he had such manifold proof that God's power was present. The king's heart was not broken; he was not really ashamed of his sin, nor was he ready to abandon it; he wanted the use of his hand again; he was quite aware his golden calf could not give it him; and he was glad of the help of the man of God to pray for him. "Intreat now the face of the Lord thy God," he says, "and pray for me that my hand may be restored to me again." Not a confession of his sin, no sign of humiliation. His hand was restored, but the grace of God which should have humbled him, only hardened him; he "turned not from his evil way."

FINLAND'S TYRANT SLAIN

THE SENATE HOUSE AT HELSINGFORS, SCENE OF THE ASSASSINATION

TO those who have been observant of the recent course of events in Finland, the news of the fatal shooting of Governor-General Bobrikoff can hardly come as a surprise. According to a St. Petersburg despatch, General Bobrikoff was shot and mortally wounded on June 16, at the entrance to the Finnish Senate at Helsingfors. His assailant was a young man named Schumann, son of a distinguished Senator of that name. Three shots were fired; the first two inflicting slight wounds in the neck and chest, and the third making a dangerous wound in the abdomen. After shooting down his victim, young Schumann immediately committed suicide. Bobrikoff died the same night.

This is one of those tragedies that are the direct result of tyranny. A leading Finlander in exile in London, in explanation of the event, says: "We were free-men for 700 years, we are now Russian serfs." When Russia decided to reduce Finland to the level of a Russian province, General Bobrikoff was appointed to carry out the task, and proved a willing instrument. In his hands, the power reposed by the Czar became an iron despotism. Under his administration, many of the most distinguished men in Finland—persons eminent in public life, in literature, art, science and education—were expelled from the land of their birth. His decrees were irrevocable; there was no appeal. Private homes were invaded, and men were arrested, torn from the bosom of their families, and from their business or profession, and compelled to leave the country within a certain number of hours, or days. Such arbitrary and brutal exercise of authority, while it brought ruin to the victims, seemed to give especial gratification to the despotic Governor.

Under Bobrikoff, the "Russification" of Finland proceeded with a harshness and severity that recall the treatment of Poland. All semblance of independent self-government was taken away from the Finns. The Finnish army was disbanded, or absorbed, by imperial instruction, in the Russian army, and all the solemn pledges given to the Finns by Czar Alexander, in 1809, and renewed by each of his successors, were violated. A country which was one of the best governed and most enlightened in northern Europe, was degraded under Bobrikoff to the level of Russian Poland. Newspapers were suppressed; passports to intending emigrants were forbidden; military service by all young men was made a rigid rule, and when the people, resenting these tyrannical acts, publicly protested, Cossacks were ordered out to clear the streets and to knout the citizens, which they did unmercifully. Riots followed in consequence.

It was apparently the fixed purpose of General Bobrikoff to break down, at whatever cost, the spirit of the Finnish people, by depriving them of their ancient liberties and of all that they held dear in their native institutions. He opposed the convocation of the Finnish Diet, and for over a year past it has not assembled. Now, it is believed, that the killing of the Governor-General will result in the permanent prohibition of the Diet, as a further punishment of the people.

Personally, Gen. Bobrikoff was haughty and austere—a man of iron determination. With the patriotic and cultured element in Finland he has always been unpopular. Many remonstrances against his despotic rule have been made to St. Petersburg, but all were unheeded. Last year he was invested, by two imperial decrees, with dictatorial powers.

He could discharge public officials, close hotels, shops and factories, banish any Finlander without trial or explanation, prohibit private meetings, dissolve associations, etc. Within a year many of the wealthiest and foremost men in the country have been banished. Among those recently exiled by Gen. Bobrikoff were several members of the Finnish nobility, capitalists and professional men. The failure of the Finns to illuminate their houses in honor of the war with Japan was punished by a proclamation forbidding people to go to bed before ten o'clock. Persons who "darkened their windows at unusual hours" were punished by Gen. Bobrikoff's orders.

Schumann, the assailant, was an official of the Department of Education and a member of the Nationalist Party. His father, two years ago, protested strongly in the Senate against the policy of the Russian Government in Finland.

MODERN IDOLS*

HOW far have this age and civilization left idolatry behind? We are not so foolish as to worship idols of wood or stone, but there is no doubt that the spirit of idolatry is still with us. It would be easy for any one to apply a test to himself. Is there any one thing in a man's life that occupies the place of a god to him? That thing may be different from the thing his neighbor cherishes, but it may be no less an idol. We are apt to take upon us an air of superiority in discussing another's faults and failings. We could never fall under the power of the intoxicating cup, as our neighbor has done. Nothing could tempt us to falsify business books and appropriate the firm's money. We pity the man whose moral fibre wilts when he is near the door of a gambling aunt. But are we really more free from the bondage of sin? God does not expect impossibilities from us. He expects us to love our children, to have a natural appreciation of the comforts of life; but he expects from us the first place in our homage, which is his due. He who exalts some other being or thing into that place, is guilty of idolatry.

Conscience, if we listen to it, will reveal the idol. When there is a collision between duty and interest; when the adherence of our hearts to principle will involve the loss of property, or stand in the way of gaining a fortune, and we sacrifice our principle for the sake of the money, we set up a golden idol and give our fealty. We are idolaters. When we have some friend, whose influence we now to be injurious, but when to surrender that friend seems like rending our ears, and we refuse to make the sacrifice, we become idolaters. When some habit has so firm a hold upon us that we could not give up its indulgence, even at God's command, we are acknowledging a power over us, higher and stronger than God's, to which we yield superior allegiance. It is our idol.

Many persons who, by their consciences, are convicted of idolatry, grieve over the fact and are at heart desirous of deliverance. They have two natures, of which one hugs the idol and the other bids them give it up. The struggle is most distressing, and is often long continued. Sometimes the victim resolves that at the first opportune moment he will shake himself free, and when the opportunity comes, he does so. Then comes desolation, misery, and a most insistent yearning for the surrendered idol. The released victim knows he has done right and that at last he is free; but can he continue? He is incapable of work; he cannot sleep, cannot give attention to anything; his thoughts are perpetually on the beloved object, and with all the strength of his nature he craves it. This is the crisis. If at this moment the opportunity of return is presented, the probability is that he will grasp and take again upon him the bonds that have been taken off. If he could only have been placed, at that crisis, where he could not return, he might have held to his better resolution. But few are able to do that. If some power could lay hold of him and compel him to be firm; if the resources of his own nature could enforce obedience to his better judgment, all might be well; but the poor, weak creature finds all fail. It is then that, if he retains his faith and will pray, God gives him the strength he needs for the conflict. Then he may yet stand with those who have overcome through the power of Christ.

How many there are, all around us, who are secretly making this struggle! Is it possible to help any one of them? The first and chief resource is in prayer. God knows the suffering, sympathizes with the poor, weak creature, and is ready to respond to his cry for help. The best weapon is that which Bunyan describes as giving the victory to Christian—the weapon of all-prayer. Next to this is the benefit of work. The man who sticks steadily to his occupation, and will not indulge in reverie and idle meditations, will find relief. Every day will bring a little relief, and after a time the conflict ceases. Then, there is the strength that comes from the assurance of victory. It is not a hopeless struggle that he is waging, but one in which, to the sincere and brave fighter, victory is promised.

Gospel Work in Liberia

Rev. L. C. Curtis, a missionary worker in Africa, has been laboring on the west coast for the last eight years. He has returned to the United States to raise a fund for an industrial school which he has built in the interior of Liberia. "There are thousands of native children," says Mr. Curtis, "on the west coast who need civilization and Christianity. When I am able to open the school I can get more native children than we can care for. Any assistance given in this work will be gratefully received and properly applied." Mr. Curtis, who is at No. 61 Bible House, New York City, is very cordially indorsed by Bishop Derrick, of the A. M. E. Church.

Roof/Leak?

applied on an old leaky shingle, tin or felt roof will make it absolutely waterproof. Stops the rusting process in tin or iron, and stops warping or rotting of shingles. Will add ten years to the life of a new or old roof.

ROOF LEAK is the most durable sun or winter proof paint or coating possible to make. Does not crack in winter or soften in summer. Easily applied. Imparts no taste to water.

ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP renders the wood absolutely waterproof, and when the shingles are nailed on the roof, they become cemented together so tightly that warping, which causes cracked shingles and loose nails, is positively prevented.

ROOF LEAK is shipped in the heavy liquid cement form, and is applied as received on worn and leaky surfaces. It is reduced with one quart of boiled linseed-oil to each gallon, if used as a durable paint on surfaces in good condition. Shingle Dip is shipped ready for dipping.

ROOF LEAK COATING AND ROOF LEAK SHINGLE DIP are made in Black, Maroon, and Dark Green. Five gallons up to any quantity, 75c. per gallon, freight paid east of Denver. Returnable at our expense, if not approved.

ROOF LEAK is sold by up-to-date paint and hardware dealers. Those who try to sell you something else are not doing you justice, because "there is nothing else like ROOF LEAK."

Liquid samples, together with an interesting booklet showing its various uses, will be sent on request, or to enable you to give it a practical test, we will send you for $1.00, delivered free to your door, one gallon, which is sufficient for cementing 100 square feet of leaky surface, or painting 200 square feet. One gallon of Shingle Dip covers about 400 square feet shingles, both sides.

Questions & Answers

W. C. B., Middleburg, Va. Have we any assurance that Simon of Cyrene, who bore Christ's cross, was a negro?

He was a Hellenistic Jew, born at Cyrene, on the north coast of Africa. Mark speaks of him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. He was present in Jerusalem either as an attendant at the feast or as a settler there. There is nothing in the records to indicate that he was a negro.

Alex. McL., Martintown, Pa. Is it Scriptural, right and proper, to attribute to God occupation?

In a sense, it is. See Christ's own language in John 5:17, and many similar passages in the Gospels. See also Genesis 1:31 and 2:2.

Subscriber, Pittsburg, Pa. What is the population of the world and the number of male and female?

The world's population is roundly estimated at 1,400,000,000, females being slightly in excess. This figure is quite arbitrary, however, as there are many countries in which no census has been taken, including Thibet, Persia, Asiatic Russia, Mongolia, many parts of South America and Africa. The actual enumeration would probably make very little material change in the estimate, which is the result of calculations by the ablest authorities on the subject of population.

I. W. B., Kewanee, Ill. 1. Was that Jewish Talmud which contained references to Jesus Christ, written in the first century? 2. Is the name of Christ mentioned by Pliny? If so, please quote the passage?

1. Yes, but it is no longer in the Talmud, having been expurgated by order of the Jewish Synod of Jaroslav, Little Poland, in 1631. 2. Pliny the Younger (the nephew and adopted son of the Elder Pliny), is doubtless referred to here. He was a cultured pagan and was born in A.D. 61 or 62. He bore testimony concerning the Christians of Bithynia, in his letter to Emperor Trajan, written forty years after Paul's death, which deals almost wholly with the subject of Christ and Christianity. The principal passage, referring to some who had apostatized from the new faith, says: "They all worshiped your (Trajan's) image and the statues of the gods; these also reviled Christ. They affirmed that the whole of their fault or error lay in this—that they were wont to meet together and sing among themselves alternately a hymn to Christ, as to God, and bind themselves by an oath not to the commission of any wickedness," etc. Pliny goes on to describe the religious customs of the Christians, and how after he had put two of them (two women servants in his house), to the torture, he discovered nothing "besides a bad and excessive superstition." He tells Trajan how the new faith has spread throughout the country, and suggests lenity and pardon to those who will abandon it and return to the pagan worship in the temples. This letter is considered one of the most valuable secular testimonies to the existence and character of Christianity in the first century.

Clara H., Aurora, Ont., Can. I do not know how nor when, I formed the habit of thinking (I fear I have inherited it) that because Christ was so very poor, I have no right either to be anything but poor. By riches, I mean possessions (honourably procured) of land, goods, money; by poverty, the lack of these things. Now, if you would be kind enough to tell me whether II Cor. 8:9, means that the poverty Christ lived in, here on earth, was the means to our riches, (riches as defined above) as well as spiritual riches, you will set at rest a whole world of anxiety in my mind.

If you will accustom yourself to regarding the possession of wealth as a sacred trusteeship, to be managed conscientiously for the glory of God and the good of humanity, you will find release from much of your anxiety. It is a tool with which you are to work, capital you are to utilize, not by hoarding or by selfish indulgence, but by wise, humane, beneficent methods, for the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth. The possession of means makes one a power either for good or evil; we must see to it that it is for good. This has no reference to "unrighteous riches," which are never justifiable and invariably brings a curse to the possessor. The passage in Corinthians means that Christ, for our sake, put off the majesty of heaven for the poverty of earth, and dwelt among men in order that they, through his sacrifice, might win eternal riches.

Mrs. E. P., Liberty, Neb. Would it be wise and right for a Protestant Christian man to marry a Catholic girl, each to retain their own faith, and neither willing to give up? Could there be any happiness in such a union?

Union with one of a different faith is apt to cause lasting regret. Even if the parents could agree to differ, there would be an impassable barrier between them, and a lack of that perfect sympathy and confidence which are essential to happy marriage. Perhaps a Nottingham village, England, whose people, to avoid the expense of entertaining royalty, turned King John from building a castle there, by designedly stupid acts. Courtiers called it a village of fools, and, though the people said, 'more fools pass through than dwell in Gotham,' 'wise man of Gotham' became satirically synonymous with stupid. Irving called New Amsterdam (New York City under the Dutch), Gotham."

Here is a unique suggestion from a reader, in connection with the "Problem of the Poor."

C. O. C., Binghamton, N. Y. True charity is to help men to help themselves. The greatest hindrance to men in their struggle to gain homes and avocations, other than simple day-labor, is interest, called in the Bible, "usury." How many thousands there are, struggling to pay off the mortgages on their homes and farms, and who never will succeed. They do well if they pay the interest, and many cannot even do that. An object-lesson could be furnished to charitable capitalists, by the Christian Church. Supposing 10,000 men contribute $10 each, or 100,000 $1 each, to a fund for this Settlement of the Alabama Claims; appointed by United States and Great Britain, 1871, met in Washington and Geneva same year. England paid the award ($15,000,000) in 1873, and the distribution was made in 1876. 2. The Joint Electoral Commission was appointed by Congress in 1877 to count the electoral vote in Presidential contest of 1876, which resulted in the seating of R. B. Hayes as President.

A. McL., Pittsburg, Pa. A friend contends that the ancients (and especially the heathen), spent sums far in excess of any modern expenditures in the equipment and decoration of their temples. Is there any foundation for such a statement?

We believe it is quite true. There is no means of knowing the extent of the Egyptian or Chaldean temple display, but it is recorded by Herodotus that the temple of Belus had ornaments, stones and shrines representing fabulous sums. On the top of this temple, Queen Semiramis placed three golden statues of Jupiter, Juno and Rhea, weighing 2,800 Babylonish talents of gold. These were enriched with sceptres of precious gems, and there were, besides, tables, goblets, censers, vases, and other vessels of great size, all of solid gold. The total value of this monarch's tribute to idolatry was estimated at $600,000,000.

Miss S. B., Canton, O. Is it a bad sign for a robin bird to come down the chimney, stay in the room all night and early next morning wake me with singing up over my head; then fly across the room, come and light on my bed and look at me within a foot of my face, and then fly to the window? When I went to get it, it didn't resist me. I let it out of the window, and it turned and sang to me. This never happened before.

Talk of "signs" is nonsense; but we should regard the incident in question as a very pretty and pleasing one. Naturalists write of many such instances of the tameness of birds. It may have been frightened, or lost its way. At all events it evidently felt safe and in the presence of a friend. There are some nature-lovers who possess a rare attraction for birds, and in whose presence the helpless little creatures show no fear, but perfect confidence.

TELLURIDE, COLO., THE CENTRE OF THE WESTERN LABOR WAR

THE town of Telluride has become noted because it is the principal centre of Colorado's "labor war," as it is termed. It is situated in a valley in the San Juan mining district, one of the most extensive producers of gold and silver in the West. For several months, Telluride has practically been an armed camp. The civil officials have in most cases been deposed, and the local government administered by the military. Most of the mines are on the hillside adjacent to the city, and as each has been provided with a strong guard to protect it from injury during the strike, and to protect the few non-union workmen, nearly a regiment has been on duty in and about the community. In the so-called "bull pen" at Telluride, has been confined Charles H. Moyer, the officer of the Western Federation of Miners, who is accused of being one of the principals in the labor difficulty. He was a prisoner there when the State authorities were recently ordered to produce him before the United States Court in St. Louis, and show cause why he should be held as a prisoner. The little city, also, has a reputation in the West for its snow-slides or avalanches. Located at the foot of some of the principal peaks of the Rockies, avalanches have several times overwhelmed buildings in the suburbs, burying scores of persons. In one disaster, over twenty were killed or fatally injured, while a large forest was completely destroyed by the force of the slide.

A Philadelphia Hospital Audience Hears the Service, and Joins in the Singing--Other Novel Uses of the Instrument

Clearly and sweetly the words of the famous old hymn, "How Firm a Foundation," came to the ears of the patients in the Samaritan Hospital, Philadelphia, on a recent Sunday. Dr. Russell Conwell had caused the hospital to be connected with the Baptist Temple by means of telephones. With megaphones strung in front of the pulpit, and receivers in the hospital wards, the singing of the splendid chorus and the words of the sermon were distinctly heard by the patients.

This idea came to Dr. Conwell while his daughter was a patient in one of the Philadelphia hospitals. At that time it was made possible for her to hear the services while they were being held in her father's church, by rigging up a temporary megaphone and telephone connection. The monotony of hospital life was so agreeably relieved by the innovation, that Dr. Conwell determined to carry the idea out on an elaborate scale. Following upon his successful experiment, telephones were placed in all the wards of the Samaritan Hospital, of which Dr. Conwell is the president, and a string of megaphones was hung in front of the platform at the church. For those patients who were too weak to hold the receiver to the ear, head attachments were provided, so that without the slightest exertion on their part, the services at the temple could be plainly heard. The voice of the preacher came strongly and clearly, every word being caught by the megaphones and carried to the delighted patients at the hospital. The singing to the accompaniment of the great organ was so realistically close that many joined involuntarily in the exercises, scarcely realizing that they were a long distance from the scenes of the services. Telephone communication with the hospital will be a regular feature of Dr. Conwell's services hereafter. Other hospitals will be connected with the church if the trustees should desire to do so. Another innovation in telephonic usage is the communication between conductor and engine-driver on moving trains, and the connecting of the train with business houses at stations where a temporary stop is made, so that passengers may talk to friends or customers without the necessity of leaving the train at all.

on to their office 'phones, and talking to them freely. In this country of long journeys, it frequently happens that a business man remembers at the last moment that matters of importance have been overlooked which should be attended to before his return. Under existing conditions, this means a long interval of mental anxiety before the train stops at a telegraphic station, where the wire can be used to remedy the oversight.

With the telephonic apparatus on the train, the traveler can communicate with his office direct from the train at the first stopping-place. As a means of having a last word with friends and relatives, the train telephone will be a great boon. "Good-byes" may be said until the train moves out. It will be much more satisfactory to the railroad men than the good-by on the platform; for instead of beseeching appeals to the friends and relatives to make haste, the train men will merely sever the wire connection and the conversation must cease.

Still another new idea in telephone business is the calling of early toilers and those who wish to catch trains in the small hours. There is no alarm clock to beat the telephone, for it continues ringing until the sleepy one gets out of bed and silences it by removing the receiver from the hook. Then the operator knows that his duty is done and stops ringing. One of the telephone companies has found this branch of the business so profitable that a regular department has been organized for the express purpose of calling customers in the morning.

A telephone of the ordinary commercial kind is placed close by the bedside, and the simple process of "calling" is to keep ringing at the hour agreed, until the response shows that the alarm has served its purpose.

PREACHING BY TELEPHONE TO AN INVISIBLE AUDIENCE

Rev. Dr. Conwell preaching through the Megaphone in the Baptist Temple, Philadelphia. The Choir also sings through the Megaphone

This idea, tried as an experiment on a Western road, and successfully carried out during a recent trip of officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad, promises to come into general use on the railroads of the country. Thus, a commercial traveler who has but a few connections in a small town, and thinks he can do better by going straight on to the next, but still desires to give his customers a chance to know of his presence on the train, can do so by having the car telephone switched

A Nation - Builder

SERMON BY

Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

VERY Fourth of July it is the custom of patriotic speakers to eulogize the names of George Washington, and Samuel Adams, and James Otis, and Joseph Warren, and Patrick Henry, and DeWitt Clinton, and John Adams, and John Hancock, and Robert Morris, and Benjamin Franklin, and John Witherspoon, and Thomas Jefferson, and Nathaniel Green, and Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay. These were the mental giants who hewed out of the new world's quarries the titanic stones which became the foundation layers of our national government. But these were not the only men in those early days of our national history to whom we, as a people, are indebted. We ought to be careful lest the glory of those luminaries blinds us to the grandeur of character of patriots less conspicuous, whose courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice helped to establish our liberties, or to extend our opportunities. To-morrow we shall celebrate our national holiday; let me present to you to-day a name that ought to be familiar to us all, but which is seldom placed in the rank it ought to have on the roll of the nation's heroes. While we honor the men who cleared away the debris, and dug out the foundation stones of our national capital, let us spare, too, a few words of praise for a man to whose daring and perseverance it is due that at least one, if not several, stars were added to those that glitter on our national flag. I place my wreath of immortelles to-day on the grave of Marcus Whitman, who practically, single-handed, saved the States of Oregon and Washington to the Union. To the heroes of Bunker Hill, and Saratoga, and Yorktown we owe it that our Eastern shores are lapped by the waters of the Atlantic; to Marcus Whitman we owe it that we hold on our western shores the crystal gates of the Pacific.

A National Benefactor

Can America afford to forget its debt to this hero? Some few years ago, Richard S. Storrs, proved that it could not, in an address which he delivered before the American Historical Society of Brooklyn, with the title, "The Contributions of Three Uncelebrated Men to the Development of the United States." The first name Doctor Storrs chose was that of Eleazar Wheelock, an humble minister, who founded Dartmouth College, the intellectual cradle of a Webster, a Choate, a Chase, and a George Ticknor. The second hero's name was Manasseh Cutler, through whose godly consecration and patriotic zeal, the reproach of negro servitude never obtained a foothold on the Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan or Wisconsin soils. The third hero whom Dr. Storrs eulogized in that remarkable speech, was Marcus Whitman, who is the inspiration of this anniversary discourse. From Dr. Storrs I learned how grand, how noble, how patriotic was this early pioneer, and as I studied his life for myself, I realized how inspiring were the lessons of that wonderful career. Let us consider some of them this morning, and may our study lead us all to become better citizens, ever ready at any cost to ourselves, to serve the highest interests of our beloved country.

How did Marcus Whitman save Oregon to the United States? First, by heeding the Macedonian Gospel cry of helplessness. Like the Pilgrim Fathers, he obeyed the direct summons which came to him in the voice of many thunderings to carry Christ's message of salvation, unto the uttermost parts of the earth. Marcus Whitman and Samuel Parker dared cross the American continent, because, from the far off Willamette Valley, came the story of the bitter need there was for the Gospel of peace to be preached to the Indian war chiefs, with scalping knives and tomahawks at belts, who, by their actions said: "We need the white man's Book of Heaven; we need the white man's Christ."

To describe how that Macedonian cry of helplessness came to Marcus Whitman, let me transplant you in imagination, back to the little frontier town of St. Louis, Missouri, and, like the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, turn back time until the year of 1832. St. Louis, at that time had a population of only a few thousand. There the gambling dens and the dance halls, and the low variety shows were in full blast. There were collected many of the dissolute characters, which, always as Satanic emissaries, infest every frontier town with a leprous, immoral infection. We will suppose, in order to make the wild, weird scene we are about to describe more vivid, that the old Indian fighter and territorial governor, up to 1821, and the United States Superintendent of the Indians, from 1821 to 1838, General William Clark, is spending a social evening with two of his old friends, who followed Lewis and himself on their famous journey of the far Northwest. Suddenly, a messenger raps at the door. In answer to the gruff call, "Come in," there enter four Flathead Indians. Two of them are aged warriors; two young stalwart braves. "Where are you from my men?" asked the general, eying them from head to foot. "From the murmuring waters of the Columbia? Impossible. From the Pacific shores? Nay, nay, that cannot be. For what did you come? For the white man's Book of Heaven? What, didst thou have to travel 3,000 miles to hunt up the white man's Book of Heaven, when the representatives of the Hudson Bay Company have for years been buying your furs?" "Yes," answered the Nez Percés Indians. "We have come three thousand miles for the white man's 'Book of Heaven.' Will you give it us?" But though the three wise men coming to seek the New-born King in the Jerusalem Capital never made more stir than did the four Flathead Indians, coming to find the white man's Christ in the Missouri frontier town of 1832; yet even there in that St. Louis frontier town, they could not find the white man's Book of Heaven. These Flathead Indians found there the white man's sins, but not the white man's God.

Disappointed Indians

Let me now read to you the strangest valedictory ever given at any place. The two older Indians, who came on this mission of seeking the white man's God, had died. When the two younger braves were about to depart for their own far-away wigwams, one of them, in Indian eloquence, spake these words, which were published in the little frontier paper of that time: "I came to you over the trail of many moons from the setting sun. You were the friends of my fathers, who have all gone the long way. I came with an eye partly opened for more light for my people, who sit in darkness. I go back with both eyes closed. How can I go back blind to my blind people who sit in darkness? I made my way to you with strong arms through many enemies and strange lands, that I might carry back much to them. I go back with both arms broken and empty. Two fathers came with us. They were braves of many winters and wars. We leave them asleep by your great water and wigwam. They were tried in many moons, and their moccasins wore out. My people sent me to get the white man's Book of Heaven. You took me where you allow your women to dance as we do not ours, and the Book was not there. You took me where they worship the Great Spirit with candles, and the Book was not there. You showed me the images of the Good Spirit and pictures of the good land beyond, but the Book was not among them to tell us the way. I am going back the long sad trail to my people of the dark land. You make my feet heavy with gifts and my moccasins will grow old in carrying them, yet the Book is not among them. When I tell my poor blind people after one more moon in the big council, that I did not bring the Book, no word will be spoken by our old men, or by our young braves. One by one, they will rise up and go out in silence. My people will die in the darkness and they will go on the long path to other hunting grounds. No white man will go with them, and no white man's Book, to make the way plain. I have no more words."

A Missionary Pioneer

It was the publication of these words copied in the Eastern newspapers, that made Marcus Whitman heed the call of the Nez Percés Indians. It was the publication of these words that nerved Whitman to consecrate all his life to giving the Flathead Indians the white man's "Book of Life." It was that resolve to go in the name of Christ to the far Northwest, which made it possible for Marcus Whitman to save Oregon to the Union. Oh, my brothers and sisters, shall we not heed the call of Christ whenever and wherever it comes, as Marcus Whitman answered Christ's call to the Willamette Valley? Shall we not say as did Whitman, "Lead, thou King of kings. And wherever thou leadest there may I be found ready to do the duty nearest at hand no matter what that duty may be." Marcus Whitman did not go to the banks of the Columbia to save Oregon for the Union. He went to the Northwest save the red men for Christ. When God calls us one sphere of work, he will always open for us other spheres of labor, if we will only obey his first call, which says, "Come! Come! Come now."

A Christian Patriot

But Marcus Whitman was a statesman, as well as a humble Gospel missionary. Like Livingstone in Africa he saw how much could be done in that land by the resources of civilization. His prophetic gaze traveled on through the centuries, and he longed to have that far region under Christian influences and prospering under the white man's skill and industry. He could hear the tramp of the oncoming generations, as well as the creaking of his cart wheels by his side. Therefore when Marcus Whitman, on the famous Fourth of July 1836, with his young bride, spread the blankets upon the top of the Rocky Mountains, with Mount Hood at Mount Jefferson standing afar off as guarding sentinels and dedicated that Western soil to God and his nation, like Paul, he was surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses. In inspired vision, he could see the farmers of 1904, planting their seeds in those valleys. He could see those mighty forests changed into homes, and factories and stores and libraries and schools and churches. He could hear the singing of the mowing machines and see the white-winged ships like great sea-gulls floating in those harbors. And as Columbus took possession of the New World in the names of Ferdinand and Isabella who fitted out his small fleet, Marcus Whitman dedicated this Western soil to his two masters: to his God and to his United States Government.

He dedicated this Western soil in spite of the fact that all that could be said to discourage settlers, had been said in calumnious disparagement. The Hudson Bay Company wanted it left in the undisturbed possession of the wild animals whose skins they were turning into gold. They wanted it for a perpetual hunting ground. Therefore, they declared it to be a land barred by impassable ranges of mountains; a land of undrained morasses, pestilential and malarial, unfit for the residence of white men; a land given up to barbarism and Indian savagery. So persistent were the falsehoods disseminated by these greedy, selfish capitalists, that before Marcus Whitman's advent, Oregon had been lying like the capstone of the Jerusalem Temple, which the builders rejected, but which afterwards became the chief of the corner.

An Unappreciated Treasure

Why, so useless was this Oregon region considered in 1842, that Daniel Webster, then premier of President Tyler's Cabinet, was willing to barter off to Lord Ashburton the whole of the far Northwest for a few privileges for the American sailors to fish for cod off the banks of Newfoundland. A few years before this, prove his utter ignorance of the intrinsic value of the land of the Northwest, Daniel Webster, then the most powerful member of the United States Senate, uncontroverted by Clay and Calhoun and Benton, made the astounding speech: "What do we want with this worthless area, this region of savages and wild beasts of deserts, of shifting sands, and whirlwinds of dust, cactus and prairie dogs? To what use could we ever hope to put these great deserts, or these great mountain ranges, impenetrable and covered to their base with eternal snows? What can we ever hope to do with the Western coast of 3,000 miles, rock-bound, cheerless, and uninteresting, and not a harbor on it? What use have we for such a country? Mr. President, I will never vote one cent from the public treasury to place the Pacific Coast one inch nearer Boston than it is now." Ah, Mr. Am I going beyond my right in declaring that Marcus Whitman, kneeling upon the top of the Rocky Mountain on the Fourth of July, 1836, and taking possession of the Western coast for God and the United States, was an inspired statesman? Am I wrong in stating that a man to be a good Christian missionary should be a noble Christian patriot also?

But Marcus Whitman had more than inspired vision and opened ears. He had a consecrated, noble Christian heart, as well as a clear brain. He was a Gospel missionary, who was ready, if necessary, to die, if, in his death, he could only accomplish the work which God had given him to do. In order to save Oregon for the Union, in midwinter, alone, he rode straight across this continent. He defied the warning elements as well as savage tribes; the terrors of the snows, and the perils of the colds, as well as the Indian tomahawks. But as I take a step further in my study of the remarkable nation-builder, I find, as with Marcus Whitman, the greatest of men are always the gentlest of men. Furthermore, I find that the seemingly unimportant incidents of their lives, which they did out of the pureness and nobility of their hearts, have sometimes had the most far-reaching effects in their ultimate triumphs.

Not only do we admire Marcus Whitman as a patriot and a hero, but as a lover and a husband, and it is a remarkable fact that his public success was in no small degree due to the qualities he displayed in his private life. Do you ask how the one could contribute to the other? I answer, by rapidly drawing three verbal pictures. Scene the first: We are now standing in the little village church of Prattsburg, in the central part of New York State. It is in the winter of 1836. February is the month. A rather short, heavily built man of reddish hair and beard, with determination marked upon every lineament of his face, is the bridegroom. Dr. Marcus Whitman is his name. A sweet-faced young lady, Narcissa Prentiss, daughter of Judge Prentiss, is the bride. In the presence of their village friends, the young couple become one. The congratulations are spoken. The words of farewell are now said. The bride and groom turn their faces West and the long bridal trip of three thousand miles commenced.

Scene the second: We are now at the frontier station of Fort Laramie, of the Platte River. The little caravan of transcontinental travelers are here told that they must unload their wagons and strap all their goods upon pack mules and horses. No wagon had ever yet crossed the mountains and no wagon could. Up to his year no white woman had ever crossed the Continent. There were two brides in that party. The one was the young wife of Marcus Whitman. The other was the bride of his missionary associate, Rev. Samuel Parker by name. "I tell you that wagon cannot go through," I hear one of the rough members of the caravan say. I now see a set look upon the face of Dr. Whitman. His jaws snap shut with the grip of a steel rap. Then a glint comes into his eye as he says, "But I tell you that wagon will go through. These ladies, my wife and Mrs. Parker, must not be compelled to ride horseback all that way." A muttered oath comes from the lips of the rough man at the fort, as he says, "All right. We will try to pull it through." And pull and push and lift that wagon through, those men did. They dragged it over the mountains and across the prairies to lighten the journey of two young women, who, as brides, accompanied their husbands to far-off missionary fields.

Scene the third. It is the year 1843. We are now standing in the White House of our National Capital. The President of the United States is John Tyler. He is smooth-faced, tall and spare of frame. The second member of this notable group has a huge, massive body, a leonine face. He is one with looks expressive of the description given by a famous English jurist: "He is the most magnificent physical as well as mental specimen of his day and generation." He is the questioner. He is Daniel Webster. The third member of the group looks like a rough mountaineer. He is clad in skins. His hair is uncut. But he is one of the immortals of his day. He is Marcus Whitman.

As we stand in the corner of the room I see a strange scene. Tyler and Webster, the two leaders of the American Government, are being driven back and back from their old positions of statecraft by this seemingly untutored man of the backwoods. "Bah," exclaims Daniel Webster with scorn, "what is the use of Oregon to the Union? That land is wholly inaccessible. A wagon road could never be built across those mountains." Then as Richelieu turned upon his king, I see Whitman turn, and hear him triumphantly say: "Mr. Secretary, that is a grand mistake that has been made by listening to interested persons. Six years ago I was told that there was no wagon road to Oregon, and it was impossible to take a wagon there; and yet in spite of pleadings and almost threats, I took a wagon over that road, and have it now." "Is that so," said Webster, "then Oregon must be saved to the Union." And so I find in these few words that the devotion which Marcus Whitman gave to his wife by compelling the men to carry his wagon over the Rocky Mountains, was one of the mighty means of helping to save Oregon to the Union. It proved that the far Northwest and the East were not separated by impassable barriers. And it furthermore proved that all men's greatest and truest successes are always dependent upon their faithfulness in the common duties of ordinary life. Marcus Whitman's love for his country is to-day associated with the pure love which he bore Narcissa Prentiss. The true successes by which we will be able perhaps to do some great act for our country, will be dependent upon how we fulfil the little duties of everyday domestic existence.

How shall we close this Fourth of July eulogy upon a great nation-builder and the saviour of the far Northwest? Like Abraham Lincoln, God took him away to his heavenly reward as soon as that work was done. The Indians, whom he came to save, incited to bitterness by the baffled foreigners, killed this noble man and his noble wife. At Walla Walla their bodies lie buried. May our lives be devoted, patriotic lives, as were those of Marcus Whitman and Narcissa Whitman. May our deaths, like theirs, be a heavenly translation. And may our neighbors, as did theirs, feel the world is better, not only because we have lived for our country but also for our God.

You know the rest. In the book you have read,
That the British were not a year ahead;
The United States have kept Oregon,
Because of one, Marcus Whitman. He Rode eight thousand miles and was not too late,
In his single hand not a nation's fate
Perhaps: but a gift for the nation she,
Would hardly part with to-day, if we May believe what the papers say upon
This great Northwest that was Oregon.

And Whitman! Ah, my children, he
And his wife sleep now in a martyr's grave Murdered! Murdered, both he and she,
By the Indian souls they went West to save.

Such is the tragic story of the life's work of the great nation-builder, Marcus Whitman. He was the missionary of 1836—the Christian patriot of 1842—the martyr of 1847.

Heavy Fighting in the Far East

AS was stated in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, the battle at Telissu (or Vafangow), between the forces of Gen. Oku and the Russian Army sent to the relief of Port Arthur, resulted disastrously to the Russians. It proved to be the bloodiest engagement of the war, thus far, the losses exceeding those of the battle at the Yalu and that at Feng-wang-cheng. On June 15, Gen. Stakelberg advanced on the Japanese position, for the purpose of driving back Oku's army and forcing a passage southward. The theatre of battle was a hill country, and the fighting, while it was very largely an artillery affair, was marked by many desperate infantry charges up bullet-swept heights. In one of these charges, the Russians had to cross a stretch of open and between two small hills and two shallow valleys. The Japanese concentrated a deadly fire as soon as the Russians reached the open. The Russians rushed from point to point, dropping and firing, until they gained a hill, where they halted. The Japanese threw shrapnel over the hill with deadly effect. Some squadrons had every officer killed and half their men wounded. The Sixth Company of the Third Russian Regiment got to within twenty paces of the Japanese intrenchments. They lost all their officers and half of their men. The battle now became a hand-to-hand fight with stones and rifle-butts, and the remainder of the Russians, taking advantage of this, gained a neighboring ravine, but were unable to hold it in the face of the hail of shrapnel from the Japanese batteries.

The Japanese heavy guns silenced the Russian artillery. Thirteen Russian guns were smashed to atoms, the horses killed, and a majority of the gunners killed or wounded. The guns were literally shot to pieces. The remainder of the artillery retired to Vafangow.

The Japanese then delivered their main attack against the Russian centre and right flank. Two regiments rushed to the assistance of the Russians. They rolled back the Japanese advance, but Gen. Oku poured in fresh troops, regiment after regiment. The Russian commander saw he was being enveloped, and retired. An hour later (at 6 P.M.), the Russian position was occupied by the Japanese, after a nine hours' battle.

There are many different estimates of the losses at Telissu. The Jiji, a leading Tokio journal, asserts that 15,000 Russians were killed or wounded. St. Petersburg despatches conservatively place the losses at 4,000, while in other well-informed quarters it is stated at 6,500. The Japanese lost in killed and wounded 2,000. They took 300 prisoners, and buried 900 of the enemy's dead, left on the field.

On June 22, it was reported that there had been a the condition of affairs in the besieged fortress. He writes:

I landed at daybreak on the morning of June 10, without detection. I could see that every hilltop near the shore was alive with soldiers, busily engaged in strengthening the already formidable fortifications, which occupied every point of vantage.

So the next day I set out on my return to Louisa Bay. I had not proceeded far from this village when I came upon a small party of sappers. In order to avoid them I made a dash up a hill, only to run into another regiment engaged in digging entrenchments. Instantly I was surrounded. The officer in command detailed a guard to take me to Pigeon Bay. There I was searched, stripped to the skin, and all my garments subjected to the closest scrutiny. My money was taken, and all the papers in my possession were examined. I was blindfolded and marched to Port Arthur. In spite of the bandage over my eyes, I was able to note that the road is of admirable construction, along which troops and artillery could move easily and rapidly.

Port Arthur was full of life and gaiety, quite out of keeping with the stories of distress that had reached Che-Foo. Indeed, nothing of this sort was observed. There seemed to be an abundance of supplies, and fresh supplies were coming in from Chinese sources. The Japanese blockade has not been effective. The harbor entrance has been freed of obstructions, the battleships have been repainted, and the fortifications are constantly being made stronger. The garrison is larger than outside information had led me to believe. The troops are in excellent condition, and the general health conditions of the city are good. There seemed to be no fear that the city was likely soon to fall.

That night the city was lively, as the officers were giving a ball. After examination I was lodged in prison, directly opposite Golden Hill. From the window of my cell I had a good view of the inner bay, and could see distinctly the repaired battleships lying at anchor. In the same prison were confined one hundred Japanese, captured from the blockading expedition. Several had become insane.

After five days in prison, I was taken before the Commander-in-Chief. I made a straightforward statement of my purpose in seeking to penetrate the Russian lines, and gave a detailed account of my trip. At last he was convinced of my good faith. He said: "You Americans must be crazy." Gen. Stoessel decided that I was to be allowed to leave Port Arthur on condition that I promise never to return. I was sent away then on a junk along with a host of Chinese. On the whole, while I was in the hands of the Russians I was kindly treated.

Fifty-two acres of land have been purchased for its site, about five miles to the southeast of the city, on rising ground, a few minutes' walk from the sea. It overlooks a scene of entrancing beauty—a spur of the Thermaic or Thessalonian Bay—and beyond, on the opposite shore, rises Mt. Olympus, the mythical home of Zeus and the ancient Greek gods.

Every foot of the land purchased is tillable, and especially good for wheat and the vine. The land lies in one of the most healthful portions of the suburban districts. An artesian well, some 275 feet deep, furnishes excellent drinking water. Eighteen months ago, the site was bare of trees or buildings. The first building erected was a little shanty for the aged caretaker. At one side of the building he put up a chimney, which furnished an open fireplace, and in the fresh mortar he wrote, practically the words, "The American School," in Greek letters. Now the little shanty has given place to a well-built farmhouse of adobe brick, consisting of one story and a basement, and measuring 37 feet x 20 feet.

Adjoining it is a barn 30 feet x 20 feet, and a brick oven for baking bread. These buildings were built under the direction of Mr. Gratchaoff, one of our pastors, who had received instruction in carpentry in the Industrial Department of the Collegiate and Theological Institute, Samokov, Bulgaria. In charge of the buildings are a Bulgarian farmer and his wife, both sincere evangelical Christians. Under their care and that of a native teacher have been placed ten of the older orphans, for whom and the other Macedonian sufferers the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have so generously contributed. The younger orphans have been left in Monastir.

Upon the farm there are now two yoke of oxen, a horse, a donkey, and some simple farm implements. Four hundred and twenty-two mulberry trees have been planted for silk culture, and fourteen or fifteen acres are under culture, the growing crops comprising oats, Indian corn, vetch, water and muskmelons, potatoes, alfalfa, and garden vegetables. These are the humble beginnings of the Institute. Something like $1,000 must have been spent, but all has been done without debt.

It is the idea of the founder to have, in a simple way, something like Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va., always keeping in mind those trades and industries which are suited to the country, such as agriculture, carpentry, blacksmithing, silk culture, pottery and others. The need of industrial education is of the most imperative nature to our Christian communities. The prevailing opinion is that all agricultural and industrial labor is menial. In order that one may belong to the "intelligent

," one must get away from the farm and the trades. Some years ago a prime minister of Bulgaria said to the writer: "We shall have 400 graduates from our gymnasia this year and we do not know what to do with them. They all want office or employment under the government. They are the ones who make the government trouble." Among our Christian communities we feel that we must, by all means, counteract these baneful ideas, by showing in our school the true nobility of labor. This we believe is the true missionary education. It will bring to the young men self-respect as they labor for what they receive, and will hasten on the day of self-support in missions. Model Christian farmers and laborers at the trades will furnish an unanswerable argument for the missionary work.

We must have for our Institute two Americans skilled along these lines, and native assistants who will be in training for the skilled teachers of the future. We need, also, buildings and their furnishings for teachers, scholars and the work. We believe your readers will recognize here the fine opportunity of doing permanent missionary work in this institution, not only for the orphans already under our care, but for all our Christian village boys, and thus help us in leading them to the life of self-respect, thrift and true Christian civilization.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF SALONICA, FROM THE SEA

The Glorious Fourth at Mont-Lawn

THE "Fourth" is always a red-letter day at Mont-Lawn, and the enthusiasm of the children is something delightful to witness. For days previous, they have been coming in groups of twenty-five and fifty, until the capacity of the "Home" is taxed to the utmost. The programme for the celebration is always such as children love, including good things to eat, games and frolics out of doors, and fireworks as soon as dusk appears. The main building and its surroundings are trimmed with the National colors, and beautiful flags float from different points of the spacious grounds. The Abigail Mission Kindergarten Band, which goes up early, when the Home is first opened, is a very enjoyable feature of Independence Day, and it never tires playing the martial airs, suitable for the occasion. The music of this band awakens the greatest enthusiasm among the children, as they listen to the strains of "My Country 'Tis of Thee," and "The Star Spangled Banner."

As usual, there were a number of visitors to the Home, who seemed scarcely less happy than the little folks, whose joyousness is contagious. Could the kind readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have made this outing possible, see for themselves the beautiful place in its gala attire; if they could hear the joyous voices of the little ones, as with palaces alight, they dance and skip about the winding walks and spacious lawns and playgrounds, we are sure that the givers would feel doubly blest in the giving.

When dinner hour comes, at tap of drum how the children scamper to fall in line for the march to the great outdoor dining-room, where, sheltered from the sun's rays they do ample justice to a bountiful meal. There are always after-dinner speeches to which the children listen with the greatest attention, especially to the kindly words of Dr. Klopsch, who is in his happiest vein when speaking to the little ones, whom he so dearly loves.

Of course there is nothing quite equal the fireworks display, in the estimation of the children, and the 1904 exhibition aroused the greatest enthusiasm among the tiny spectators who watch with delight the brilliant rockets, and set pieces which are set off in turn. When night has settled down, the outline of the hills grows sharp and dark against the starry sky, the river flowing softly by reflects the lights along either shore, and the tired little revelers in their white beds, sleep the dreamless sleep of childhood. Good-byes are said by departing guests, and the quiet night reigns over all at Mont-Lawn.

How Grandfather

Pettingill Celebrated

By SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

"On with your holiday rig, and come along," he cried

GRANDFATHER PETTINGILL opened the big farmyard gate and stood patiently waiting for the gray team and surrey to pass through. It was very early in the morning, for the sun was just making his appearance over the eastern hills, painting the sky in splendor, but Grandfather Pettingill's son John, Mrs. John, little Miss Carolyn and Master Horace, were going to the very grandest Fourth of July celebration ever held in Cameron, some twelve miles away, and they had planned to get an early start.

As the carriage rolled through, Mrs. John called out in her shrill, rasping tones: "Now, Grandad, don't go to napping and forget to look after the chickens. I wouldn't have them get into my flowers for a pretty penny. There isn't much for you to do, so you can just sit and watch them. The cream's in the churn all ready; it won't take long to bring the butter, but mind you, work it well and get all the buttermilk out. Your dinner's on the pantry shelf. There's a piece of pie and some jelly in a glass for your bread. I didn't get up any extra fixings, seeing we were going away. I knew you didn't care what you ate so there was plenty of it."

"And I wish you'd just fill up the trough with water for the stock, father," said Mr. John, checking the grays a moment. "I hadn't time to see to that. And you might look after the garden a bit, seeing you like to putter around. It needs weeding the worst way."

"And, Grandad, don't you dare forget my canary," interposed little Miss Carolyn pertly; "I couldn't tend to him, and he hasn't a mite of seed nor a drop of water."

Grandfather Pettingill's face twitched and he laid his hand on the carriage wheel detainingly.

"I wish you'd stop and take Mary Ann and the boy along, John," he said anxiously. "It's long since they had a bit of pleasure, and they live a hard life, a hard life."

"My goodness, Grandad, have you taken leave of your senses?" exclaimed Mrs. John, with an ill-concealed sneer. "The very idea of our stopping for Mary Ann and Ross! Why, it would take us full half a mile out of our way, for one thing, and then we should have to wait for them to get ready. Such nonsense! You know very well that Mary Ann has no time for pleasuring, as she has her living to make. If I was in her place I'd want to put in my time, even on the Fourth. It is a good way to celebrate, anyway—working to keep independent of one's friends." And Mrs. John Pettingill laughed; a biting, sarcastic laugh, that made Grandfather shrink sensitively away. Still, he ventured to argue the case.

"Mary Ann is extremely quick: it wouldn't take her ten minutes to get ready," he said, clasping his old hands together nervously in a pathetic way. "And the boy is no trouble, no trouble at all. You know you said yourself, John, that the boy was no trouble."

"No trouble!" repeated little Miss Carolyn scornfully; "I'd like to know what you call being crowded to pieces, Grandad. There isn't a speck of room for them. I should think you might see that without being told. With Horace and papa in front, and mamma and me behind, where is the room, I should like to know? Besides, Aunt Mary Ann looks so queer; she hasn't anything fit to wear, and it would mortify us to death to take her and Ross to Cameron." And Carolyn smoothed her frills and ribbons with an air of conscious pride.

"Tut, daughter!" said Mr. John, in a voice of the mildest reproof, gathering up the reins; "however, father, I guess we'd better leave them at home this time.

It's a goodly distance, and going to be hot, and there's load enough for the horses as it is. You may as well turn the brown mare out in the lower lot, as there's nobody to use her. And it isn't at all likely we'll get home until after night, so you had better get the milking and other chores done."

Away rolled the rubber-tired carriage swiftly down the long stretch of road, which looked in the morning sun like a long white line, and after it went the old man's eyes, with enough sorrow in them to break one's heart.

"I don't so much care how they treat me," he murmured to himself, as, with drooping head, and a cloud on his fine old face, he finally closed the big gate, and walked listlessly away in the direction of the barn. "I've got kind of used of being given the go-by, and it doesn't so much matter, as I'm pretty nearly through life in this world anyway. Sixty-nine is but a step or two this side the grave. But Mary Ann—to have her and her boy slighted, that sticks!"

He sat down upon a pile of lumber in the barnyard, and looked slowly and thoughtfully about him. Three years had made a wonderful difference in the aspect of that once beautiful and shady old place. The grass used to be thick and green and smooth as a carpet; the barn itself, the perfection of neatness, with well-swept floor, every tool in the shed in order, the machinery all housed and cared for, and an air of thrift and comfort pervading everything; now the soft turf had been rooted and torn by the hogs and calves and colts; the shade trees, so many of them, had been ruthlessly cut down and their stumps half burned; the yard was littered with lumber, old rails, tin cans, broken glass, and a little of everything; the barn-floor was piled full of barrels and boxes and tools out of place; the shed was a sight painful to orderly eyes, and the splendid mowing machine and reaper were left out in the weather, to rust and decay.

The old man sighed heavily. John had proved a miserable farmer and a cruel disappointment, and Mrs. John was a veritable "thorn in the flesh." He had never intended to be taken possession of and subjugated by them as he had been. But when they came to him, it was at a time when his heart was stricken and in want of sympathy, and his hold on life weakened by the sudden death of his beloved wife; and when they had offered to close up their affairs in the way of business and housekeeping in the city and established themselves with him upon the farm, he had acquiesced without much thought or care about the matter, except that it was kind in them to think of caring for him in his trouble and loneliness. It did not take them long, however, to make themselves master and mistress, not only of the farm, but also of him, and to so insinuate themselves into his affairs, especially his finances, that he could not rid himself of them without open rupture and bitter resentment; and as the old man was of a most peaceful disposition and abominated family discords, and as he could not bear that his friends and neighbors, who thought it "wonderfully good and unselfish for John and his wife to leave their own home to come out in the country just to look after him," to find out the wretched truth, he chose to keep still rather than to speak and assert his rights. So he allowed himself to be set aside and snubbed and treated disrespectfully by Mrs. John and the children, and looked on with a weary, sinking heart at the ruthless changes made in house and furniture and everything about the place; the extravagance and waste and pitiless destruction, and made no protest at being treated as if he were a dependent old parent without a penny in the world, instead of the owner of a prosperous farm of more than two hundred acres.

But when Mary Ann, the daughter of his second marriage, John being the son of the first, returned from the far West, widowed, with a lovely boy of nine or ten years, the aspect of things changed. The old man made a vigorous struggle to restore things to a proper basis, and make an amicable settlement, but John and Mrs. John did not look upon Mary Ann and her boy with a friendly eye at all, and tightened their grip upon his possessions, and grew daily more arrogant as they felt an increase of power, so that Grandfather Pettingill found innumerable hindrances to every plan made for his daughter's comfort. More than two years reckless extravagance had involved him in many grievous money troubles, also, so that he was greatly handicapped, but he managed to settle his daughter in a cottage belonging to him in the village of Hamilton, two miles away, where she cheerily set to work as a dressmaker to make her living, to the old man's great distress.

"And I with a home and plenty to give her, if everything wasn't tied up in this knot," he would lament, twenty times a day. "She is the one who ought to keep my house for me, and bear me company. I could be happy and care-free with her—my own old independent self; but they've got me into this snare and they mean to keep me there and get out of me all I've got, and it looks like they were going to do it, for I haven't got the spirit of a mouse any more. I'm that mean-feeling, and that crushed and ashamed that I can't look folks square in the face any more." He picked off a pine splinter from the pile of lumber, and chewed it thoughtfully.

"I wouldn't have believed that anyone could make such a child of me," he went on musingly. "Independence Day, and I, a man of means, treated as having no rights, and I keep mum. I just keep mum, so as to have peace and keep the world from knowing what a contemptible son I have. These things are hard to bear; it all hurts worse on the Fourth than any other day, too. If I could think out a way—if I could get up the grit—if Mary Ann and the boy—." Here he paused, and the sun climbed higher and grew hotter as he sat and thought while he chewed his pine stick.

Suddenly he rose, and the bent shoulders straightened and the faded eyes kindled with renewed youth. "I'll do it!" he exclaimed; "I'll do it, no matter what comes. It's got to be done sooner or later, and it may as well be to-day and now." And away he strode with the energy and vigor of a man of forty.

He pumped the big trough full of water for the stock, and fed the canary, but the cream was left standing in the churn and the garden unweeded, and the chickens held high carnival in the flower-beds, while he arrayed himself in his best clothes, locked up the house, and, instead of turning the brown mare out in the lower lot, hitched her to the little wagon and drove toward Hamilton at a good round pace. He looked as he had not once since the death of his wife. His head was erect; there was a smile on his face, and an air of resolution to his whole man to which he had been a stranger. When he reached his daughter's neat little house he Is Peace a "Child's Dream"?

THAT was a very remarkable statement to which ex-Governor Frank S. Black, of New York, one of the leading orators at Chicago, gave utterance, a few days ago. In striking phrases, he drew a bold picture of the war spirit of the world to-day. He said:

The fate of nations is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees; you may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life; you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to abide forever on this earth only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.

This sounds more like a paragraph from some pagan orator than the language of a public speaker in our enlightened age. Brilliantly eloquent, and, true in part, it is yet wholly sophistical. War is no longer regarded among the civilized peoples as a desirable thing, but is rather mourned as a calamity. Mankind has at last begun to recognize the fundamental truth that no principle is ever settled by violence, and that there is no difference or dispute between nations which is incapable of being adjusted by reasonable process, under international law and without resort to war.

"War is hell!" Sherman's famous characterization, and its counterpart by Grant, "Let us have peace," found an approving echo in the heart of every thoughtful American. The peace-lover is neither coward nor poltroon; he is perhaps the truer patriot, who labors not to involve his country in quarrels but to honorably preserve its peace and its material happiness, by employing the divine gift of reason instead of rushing into violence. For war is not only ruinous in a material sense, it is the complete subversion of the moral sense, the triumph of the brute nature over the intelligent mind and the sympathetic heart. It is the reversion of man to the old conditions, when society was based upon the logic of force alone. It is harking back to barbarism.

In one of the national galleries abroad, there is a famous picture—"The Conquerors." In the foreground, over a broad highway, are seen advancing a company of figures on horseback. A closer view reveals the features of nearly all of the world's great warriors, whose glorious deeds have thrilled the ages. But their faces are sad beyond expression, and as we follow the direction of their gaze, we see that the plains on either side of the gray highway are lined with an innumerable host of the sheeted dead. Such is the history of military glory throughout all time. "The two saddest things in the world," sighed Wellington, "are a battle lost and a battle won."

We do not believe there are many who indulge in "the child's dream" of peace, to the extent of anticipating an early fulfilment of the universal hope. But all things point to its ultimate realization. And we believe our people, in common with the whole human race, cherish that universal longing for peace which the prophet Isaiah foretold, which seers, philosophers, philanthropists, statesmen, and even parliaments and congresses have foreshadowed, and toward which mankind is steadily and hopefully marching.

Sabbath Observance

FEW questions of conduct occasion more doubt and difficulty than that of the observance of the Lord's Day. Is it right to do this or that on the day? Is it sinful to perform certain duties, or to indulge in certain recreations on the day? are questions continually asked, and to which very varied answers are given. The reason is, that in the New Testament no definite manner of observing the day is prescribed. The Jew knew exactly what was, and what was not, permissible on the Sabbath, and the law laid down in the old Testament was so fully and minutely elaborated by the Scribes, that there was scarcely any act, personal or domestic, that was not duly labeled and assigned to one category or the other. But under the new dispensation, the Christian passed from law to grace, and with his greater liberty came increased responsibility. The Christian in this, as in other matters, is put on his honor, and is no longer tied and bound by minute rules.

As Christ showed, when discussing another commandment, this freedom entailed a higher rule of life than the law could ever produce. In the particular instance he was dealing with, he pointed out that the righteousness of the Christian must exceed even that of the Scribes and Pharisees. With them it was sufficient if they refrained from overt violations of the law, but the Christian was recreant to his duty, if, while he did not commit the actual sin, he had a desire for the sin. He was left free, but deeper and more thorough purity was expected of him.

Paul's simile of the law as a schoolmaster, belongs to the same line of thought. The boy, under the schoolmaster, was required to obey the rules of the school. When he grew to manhood he was free from those rules; but if he had profited by them, he would do voluntarily and spontaneously the things he had previously done under compulsion. The boy must be instructed to honor and obey his mother; the man needs no such command. He naturally and freely shows her that tender affection and loving reverence which are more beautiful than enforced respect. Thus it is with the holy day. The minute restrictions are removed, but the more intelligent and deeper-seated observance of the day is voluntarily rendered. This is "the law of liberty" which is the rule of the Christian's life.

We have, therefore, to ask ourselves why we devote one day of the week to God's service, and to seeking spiritual good. We do so because God is entitled to that portion of our time, and because so much is necessary to our own spiritual progress. We ought to serve God, to praise him, and pray to him every day; but we need to be released from worldly business and concerns on one day, so that our minds may be entirely free to dwell on divine things, and to render active service in Christ's cause. Thus, though the Jew would break the Sabbath by lighting his lamp, or kindling a fire, he did not break it by sitting at home reviewing in his mind the business of the past week, and planning new enterprises for the coming week. The Christian may light his lamp or kindle his fire without offence, and do many things forbidden to the Jew, but he would violate the spirit of the day by giving his attention to his business concerns.

It is not necessary, therefore, to the Christian to have any hard-and-fast rules of Sabbath observance. If he honestly and sincerely uses the day for its legitimate purposes, he will be sure to keep it holy, even though some work of necessity or mercy, that involves a technical violation of form, is done. His conscience is his guide, and as the apostle said, "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth."

The Child with the Pink Rose

ONE of the most pathetic and touching incidents connected with the recent Slocum disaster, was the finding of a tiny baby girl, whose little body remained unrecognized and unclaimed. Dressed in a white robe of finest muslin, with a pink rose fastened in her baby cap, the child's body was one of the first taken from the wreck. "The child with the rose," she was called at that gruesome place—the Morgue—where she lay for days, awaiting identification. Yet no one came to claim the mite. Poor little baby! No one knew who she was, and no one even asked about a baby that would fit her description. Yet she must have been somebody's darling! Perhaps both father and mother are lying under the cruel waters that dash and swirl so madly at Hell Gate. They must surely be dead. The care taken with her dress, the little touch of affectionate admiration, indicated by the rose, showed that she had been the pride, the darling treasure of some father and mother, the sunbeam of their home. If, in her play, she had strayed away and been lost, we can imagine how anxiously she would have been sought—what tears would have been shed, and how tirelessly every street and avenue in the city would have been explored, until she was again safe in her mother's arms! Yet, there she lay, lovely in death, unrecognized, unclaimed!

Oh, the pathos of it! No one to care for the form so precious only a few weeks ago. No one to take up the dear dust and lay it tenderly in its last resting-place. A mere number in the long list of unidentified dead. But He who when on earth so loved little children, has surely garnered that young soul, and has taken it where neither sorrow, nor temptation, nor sin can ever hurt it. Perhaps we ought not to grieve. One who had in her face such promise of womanly beauty, might, if she had lived, have come to harm on life's dangerous path. It is the loveliest and most precious of the children who do encounter the greatest dangers. Rather than dropping tears over the tragical fate, can we do nothing for such children to save them from a doom infinitely worse than was that of this "child with the rose?" They are all about us, growing up amongst perils, and are passing daily and hourly into a condition which when we see it, we say, "better she had died in her innocence." Let our pity, our concern go out to the living. In a few years we can do so little for them. Reform, reclamation, the weary, almost hopeless, work of rescue will be all that is left for us. But now while they are young, cannot the Christian do more than is being done to obey the Master's last injunction, "Feed my lambs?" Cannot these bright, blithesome, innocent little creatures be brought under Christian influence and saved from falling? In the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn there are every year specimens of this time of crisis, children, beautiful and docile, who show by their words and manner how easily a little kindness and tactful teaching, at the right moment, may save them from evil. It is a shame to us that they should be lost. Can we not, each in our own neighborhood, make ourselves the friends of the little ones and gather them into Christ's kingdom? They are worth saving. "O such is the kingdom of heaven."

Chaplain Brady's New Story

AT this time, when the United States is taking a foremost place among the nations of the world, as a great naval power, the new Sea Romance, "The Two Captains," which begins in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 27, will be read with intense interest and appreciation. Chaplain Cyrus Townsend Brady of the United States Navy, the author of the story, which we have now in preparation, has woven around the brilliant careers of Nelson and Napoleon a tale so charming and so thrilling that it is the very romance of history. It is a story that is both fascinating and educational; it enchants while it instructs. Chaplain Brady has made such a study of these two men as has enabled him to present them in a way that gives to the reader a delineation of character vivid, life-like and accurate to the last degree. He has brought out their nobler qualities without extenuating their weaknesses.

The time of the story is that period which includes the siege and capture of Toulon in 1793, and Bonaparte's expedition to Egypt in 1798. Among the great historic incidents are the Battle of the Nile, and the defeat of Brueys by Nelson at Aboukir Bay. But the action of the story is by no means confined to the sea. For Murat, Kleber, Junot, LaSalle, and other celebrated soldiers, all appear upon the canvas. On the British side, King George III, his court and Lord Chatham are among the picturesque characters introduced. Through the whole, like a thread of pure gold, runs the romance of the young and beautiful Louise de Vaudemont and Captain Macartney, who pass through many extraordinary perils and adventures.

It is a delightful story, pure and uplifting, full of exciting situations and most agreeable surprises, and should be read in every home in the land. Urge your friends to subscribe now, and thus share the general enjoyment of Chaplain Brady's fascinating story from the opening chapter to the very last of the great historical tableaux.

THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES

WITH a unanimity rare in our political history, the Republican National Convention has chosen its standard-bearers for the Presidential campaign. The choice was a foregone conclusion. For several months past, it was evident that President Roosevelt would be nominated, and such doubt as there was about the candidate for the second place on the ticket had been gradually disappearing. The decision must be extremely gratifying to the President, as it is unprecedented for a President who was elected as Vice-President, to so conduct his administration during his term, as to win a nomination from his party for the first place. It is a tribute to him, that a man so familiar with political history as he, will be able to appreciate. No reliable forecast has yet been made of the candidates who will be nominated by the Democratic National Convention, which meets today at St. Louis, but there is a probability of the choice falling upon men similarly high-minded, and so we may look forward to a clean and honorable campaign, conducted not by personalities but by principles.

The record of both the Republican candidates is so well known, that a brief summary of the chief events is all that is necessary in this place. President Roosevelt is a member of a family which came to this country from Holland in 1649. He is the son of its representative at that time, became one of the Albion men of New York, and members of the family served in the War of the Revolution. President Roosevelt was born in New York City, Oct. 27, 1858. He studied at a private school, and at the age of eighteen entered Harvard University. After his graduation, in 1880, he spent a year in travel. On his return, his district elected him to the Assembly, and he was twice re-elected. He spent his vacations in the far West, and became passionately fond of hunting big game. In 1886 he was Republican candidate for the mayoralty of New York, but was defeated by Abram S. Hewitt. President Harrison, in 1889, appointed him a Civil Service Commissioner, which post he held until 1895, when he resigned, to accept the office of Police Commissioner under Mayor Strong. In 1897 he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy, but resigned, to enter active service in the war with Spain, as Colonel of the regiment of Rough Riders, which he organized. His bravery in the charge of San Juan Hill has been often described. In 1898 he was elected Governor of New York State. Two years later he was elected Vice-President, and succeeded to the Presidency on the death of President McKinley, September 14, 1901. President Roosevelt was married in 1883, to Miss Alice Lee, who died two years later, leaving one daughter. In 1886 he married Miss Edith Kermit Carow. They have five children, of whom four are boys.

Senator Fairbanks is an Ohio man by birth, and comes of Puritan ancestry. He first saw the light on a small farm near Unionville Centre, May 11, 1852. His early years made him acquainted with poverty, but the boy was bent on getting an education. All summer he worked on the farm, and helped his father in his trade as a wagon maker; but in the winter he studied hard in the district school and at home. By the time he was fifteen, he had saved $41, and decided with that sum to enter college. His parents were Methodists, so Ohio Wesleyan University was the institution selected. During his college term, he eked out his small capital by work in a carpenter's shop, and in vacations he was busy on the farm. He graduated in 1872, and went to Pittsburg, Pa., to begin the study of law. Later he entered a law school at Cleveland, O., and in 1874 was admitted to the bar at Columbus, O. In the same year he married Miss Cornelia Cole, a college friend, and went to Indianapolis, Ind. to begin practice. He succeeded from the beginning, and soon became prominent in politics. In 1897 he was elected United States Senator, to succeed Daniel W. Voorhees, and was re-elected last year. The Senator is an active Methodist, and a liberal giver to Methodist causes. Mrs. Fairbanks is President-General of the Daughters of the American Revolution. She is the mother of five children, one of whom, a promising boy, is studying at Yale.

We are thankful to know that both men are identified with the Christian Church, and not among those who consider that religion has nothing to do with politics. If, as is probable, the Democratic Convention nominates candidates of the same kind, the Christian patriot will of his comrades were buried, and there, to his surprise, saw his own name among others on the memorial shaft. He said, "I could have applied for a pension, but after hearing the orator's speech on that Memorial Day it seemed a poor exchange. You see, he made me out so much better than I was, that I got to feeling that myself as I might have been, lay buried there, and I let it all go." It was a sad reflection. How many of us might have a similar feeling! There are very few who are what they might have been; but those who have put their trust in Christ, have the Apostle's hope to solace them.

It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him (I. John 3: 2).

The Slocum Horror

It is probable that criminal prosecutions will be instituted against some of the persons who are considered responsible for the awful sacrifice of life described in this journal last week. It is now believed that by a conservative estimate, not less than 1,086 persons, chiefly women and children, were drowned, or burned to death, or crushed under the feet of frantic men, on board the General Slocum, on June 15. The number of bodies already recovered is 912. The number of persons who are still missing and have not been found among the dead, is 290. Some of these may yet be found alive, but of that there is little hope. The evidence at the inquest shows that the life preservers on board the boat were old and rotten and, therefore, useless. It is also proved that the hose that was to be used in case of fire, was of that cheap kind that was of no service in an emergency. The crew appear to have been concerned only about their own safety. One man acknowledged that he had not put a life preserver on any of the women and children. He had put one on himself and came safe to land. Another admitted that he had jumped from the burning steamer into a boat alongside, which was already crowded, and after he had been warned not to jump.

He said, by jumping, he had unfortunately capsized the boat, but had been able to swim ashore; but he had not attempted to save any of the people who had been thrown into the water by his selfish act. There are other instances of gross barbarity on the part of the crew. It is also alleged that the company who owned the boat had neglected to take obvious precautions to insure the safety of their patrons. If these statements are true, the authorities would be recreant to their duty if they did not try to have the guilty persons punished.

If thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain; for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil (Rom. 13: 14).

BRIEF NOTE

The New York Foreigners' Mission, which has done very successful service among the Chinese, Syrians and other foreigners in the city, is offering opportunities for students who are preparing for work in missionary fields abroad. Almost every nationality under the sun has representatives in New York and an effort is being made by the mission to give them the Gospel. Intending missionaries, by connecting themselves with the mission, are thus brought in contact with people of the races among whom they expect to labor, and can learn the nature of the difficulties they will have to encounter. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing Miss Helen F. Clark, 21 Mott Street, New York.

have no apprehension as to the result of the election. But it becomes everyone to pray that God will take the destiny of our beloved country into his charge, and will so influence the voting, that the successful candidates may be like those men of old, of whom it was said:

Visits His Reputed Grave

A man has just returned to his home in Lawrence County, N. Y., from his annual visit to the grave where he is supposed to lie buried. It has been his custom for many years to go to a small town near Akron, O., on Memorial Day, and listen to the speeches and take part in the ceremonies. To a fellow-traveler he said that he had served in an Ohio regiment during the war and in one of the last battles he was severely wounded. He was still in the hospital when peace was proclaimed and afterwards was sent West by a contractor, who made his acquaintance and took him into his service. After some years he drifted back and settled in New York State. He had no relatives left then and did not make himself known. Being in Ohio a few years later on Memorial Day, he went to the cemetery where many

Our Famine Orphans Visited

THE REV. JOHN BANCROFT DEVINS, D.D., GIVES A GRAPHIC PICTURE OF THE GREAT WORK HE SAW WHILE IN INDIA

Dr. Devins, during his stay in India, will visit several of the orphanages wholly or partly supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Interdenominational Committee, and will, I am sure, meet with the heartiest co-operation on the part of all those in charge. While thus engaged, Dr. Devins is the personal representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will therefore be entitled to all the information to which this paper or the writer would be entitled.

WITH such an introduction from the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the reception accorded me is easy to imagine. In the Government House in Calcutta, the private secretary to Lord Curzon, the Viceroy of India, remarked as he read the letter:

"Well, you know what we think of Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's work for the famine orphans of India. The Kaiser-i-Hind medal just sent to him is the best evidence of our appreciation that we can give."

The officers of the Government in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, all joined in this expression of gratitude to the editor and the readers of the paper who have used it as a medium for saving the lives of many thousands of orphans.

It is said that a boy went to a circulating library, and asked for a book which would tell him how to get educated and how to stay so. The feature of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's benefactions which has impressed itself most deeply upon the minds of all classes in India—English officials, Christian missionaries, Indian gentlemen, and the orphans themselves, is this: Life has been saved and then maintained. Sentiment may be enlisted in saving lives, but principle is needed to enable the work to be effective. The conclusion which I have reached after nearly three months in India during the present year, in which time thousands of CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans were visited, and reports received from many hundreds of those whom I could not visit, is this:

Five thousand children have been saved from suffering and starvation; they are being maintained at slight expense, with sanitary surroundings, and they are being trained under influences which will inevitably lead the most of them into Christian life and character; further, a bond of sympathy, human and divine, has been formed between patron and beneficiary, as helpful to the former as to the latter. In this conclusion, Mrs. Devins, a former missionary in India, who visited the orphanages with me, heartily concurs.

In the visitation, three points were kept constantly in mind: 1. The present condition and system of operations of orphanages; 2. The possible spiritual outcome of the orphanage work, and 3. The future of young girls in India, especially the three thousand now being educated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In subsequent articles, these subjects and others will be treated somewhat fully.

We entered India at Calcutta, after visiting the Philippines, Japan, Korea, Manchuria, China and Burma. As we sailed up the treacherous Hooghly on our way from Rangoon and came near our landing-place, we had our first glimpse of the poverty existing in the great Empire. Mrs. Devins called my attention to an object in the "sacred" stream. The body of a man, the limbs burned off at the hips, was lying face upward, with the hands crossed as if in prayer, and being carried by the swift current out to sea. Later we were told by the attendant in charge of a burning ghat that it had probably come from a similar ghat in the country; it is not uncommon, he said, especially in famine time, to begin the cremation of a body and then to put out the fire after the burning has begun, in order to save the wood, pushing the charred remains into the stream. "Of course," added the attendant, "that is never done at this place. We never take a body to burn unless the full price is paid; this enables us to use enough wood to make the cremation complete, but where the people are poor, they are not so particular, you know."

The principal orphan work in Calcutta assisted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund is under the direction of the Woman's Union Missionary Society and the Bengal Mission, carried on by the Rev. and Mrs. D. H. Lee. In both of them we saw the children as well as the missionaries; we saw them in their rooms as well as at play; and we saw them at their meals also. The inspection was by no means a formal one. Whatever we desired to see was shown without a moment's hesitation, and many suggestions were made which aided us in seeing how the work of the orphanages is done.

It is Sunday morning in Calcutta. At six o'clock I rise, and after a hasty chota hazri (a "little breakfast" of tea and toast), start for Wellington Square, where I am to meet Mrs. Lee, to accompany her to the Sunday School in a much-neglected part of the city. Mr. Lee and some of the workers go in another direction, as the two Bible women, Mrs. Lee and I start for the one assigned to us that morning.

A ride of two or three miles brings us to the school, and early as it is—about seven o'clock—and cold as it

A BAND OF INDIA BIBLE WOMEN SETTING OUT TO WORK

These devoted Christian women, now trained to service, were famine orphans is, for them—the second Sunday in January—the rooms where the school is held, are already well-filled. But children keep coming until the school is closed. Many come from the houses in the neighborhood, not a few from one of the zenanas—little wives, so young, that Mrs. Lee says their husbands, if they know anything about it, do not believe that they are old enough to receive any harm; and yet they are old enough to be married. Mrs. Lee is a member of a committee organized to protect young children, and if a husband threatens to make his child-wife live with him, the law is invoked; a child may be married at birth, but the government seeks to protect the girl until she is entering her teens—unless she has Christian friends this protection cannot be secured.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee believe that the orphans should have something to look forward to as they grow older and so they have purchased a piece of land near the school, and are beginning a few simple industries, which will serve now to produce a slight income and later provide for several families, as it is probable that the famine boys and famine girls will pair off at a proper age.

The famine boys and girls have grown so that the Lees suddenly find themselves surrounded with a number of young men and women.

Those who came to them thirteen or fourteen years of age, without ever having seen a book; now, with the exception of two or three, read their Bible, write and cipher. About ten of the boys are earning wages, and save the money. The missionaries take out that which pays for the board and clothes, and a few cents for pocket-money for them, and put the remainder into the hands of each of them having his own bank-book. Some of them have already saved fifteen and twenty dollars. They work in the printing press, as letter carriers, as office boys; others at trades. Not a few are bricklayers, and soon will soon become good carpenters. Others are in the dairy and poultry business, just beginning their work. The older boys are beginning to plan for a little home of their own, and are wooing the dusky maidens from among those who shared the same sad famine experience, and came from their own part of the land. The girls take a little tact and wisdom to guide them through this, of all time, the most serious in any boy or girl's life. But they come to the missionaries with all their plans, and find loving help and sympathy, which binds them closer and closer to one another.

A young boy of marriageable age, in the missionary employ, said to the cook: "Learn to cook well, for I am fond of good things, and when you come to my house to cook for me, I want you to know all that the ladies can teach you."

This was considered a proposal, and the missionaries arranged for the young couple to meet at suitable times and places, and one of the first Indian courtships, carried on in an American manner, culminated in the marriage of the couple.

After inspecting the building and walking over the "farm" of three acres, we return to the school and see the offering; many coins among the gifts, but a great deal of rice is poured in the measure, by the little girls, especially. In many cases it means a sharing with the Lord a part of the child's breakfast—sometimes the entire breakfast allowance goes into the measure for the Lord's poor, by those who are really at the point of starvation themselves.

Observing a peculiar mark on a child's head, I asked the meaning:

"She is a wife," replied Mrs. Lee. "How old is she?"

"Between six and seven. There are five wives in the Sunday School to-day, between the ages of ten and five years."

"But they are not really wives."

"I have seen a child of five years the mother of a baby several months old," was the answer received from this missionary.

Children like those shown in the basket picture on this page may be the offspring of such a marriage. "Little Girlie," as the one at the left is called, was found on the street and carried to the orphanage, while Pr. (Beloved) was found in a rubbish pile. That the basket children may be leaders among their people even as Moses, another "basket baby" was, is the prayer of those who look into their little brown, wondering faces.

There are seven Sunday Schools going on in Calcutta to-day under the direction of the Lees. In some of them the teachers are rescued orphans, so quickly the children develop not only physically, but mentally and spiritually as well. Seven hundred children cluding the orphans in the home school, are under instruction. Thirty-three villages are reached by the workers every week—here, again, the famine people are among the helpers. Ten boys have just been transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

One famine boy, who is the keeper of the missionary box, interests us very much, and we learn his story. He came from the country with a large company of famine boys. A lad younger than himself seemed to be his brother, and over him the older boy kept a careful eye. After they had been in the home a short time, the "little father" said to Mr. Lee:

"Are we going to stay here?"

"Yes, my son; why do you ask?"

"And they are not going to separate us?"

"Why, no; why do you ask?"

"You won't send us away?"

"Why, no, my child. You are going to stay here. Why are you disturbed?"

"If I tell you something, you won't put us apart?"

Receiving every assurance that could be given, the boy confided a great secret to Mr. Lee.

"Say, she isn't a boy, she's a girl. She isn't my brother, she's my sister."

"How does she come to have short hair, and wear a boy's clothing?"

Told in a faltering manner, this story was given:

"Well, our parents are dead, the famine killed them, and she and I are all that are left. I heard that you couldn't take girls here, and I couldn't leave her behind to die, so I cut her hair myself, and put on a boy's clothing, and nobody guessed my secret. But I thought we were going to stay here, I would just tell you."

In the mission buildings in Wellington Square I take breakfast with Mr. and Mrs. Lee and some of their workers, after their return from the several Sunday schools. Then a visit is made to three classes of children, with an address to each of them. When Mr. Lee fills the children that the speaker represents THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a smile lights up every face among the older children, and at Mr. Lee's suggestion, a hearty vote of thanks is sent to the editor of the paper, and another to the kind friends who are making possible for these bright children to have hope in this life, and in another one, too.

But who are the Lees, of whom I am speaking with loving appreciation? The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have not forgotten the fearful disaster at Darjeeling, in the Himalayas, in September, 1899. In violent rainstorm, lasting about forty-eight hours, the rainfall was more than two feet. The falling of earth and rocks about the house in which six of the Lee children were spending the latter part of their vacation became so threatening that they tried to escape; but failing in their effort, the house was swept from the hillside, and the six young and promising lives were carried into eternity. One boy was found in a dying condition, and he lived only two or three days; the body of another child was found, but the bodies of the other four, and the house itself, were as completely lost as if the earth had swallowed them up. Not a glimpse of the house was ever seen again. I saw the hill in Darjeeling on which the house had stood. Nature has removed all trace even of the site of the house; vines and bushes covering the place where the tragedy occurred.

A sorrow that would have crushed most hearts turned the hearts of the parents to the suffering children about them. With a consecration beautiful to behold, they began to live for the orphans deprived of parents, as they had been deprived of their bright, happy, Christian children. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund has been a valued agent in this work, and the faithful workers are extremely grateful for the assistance given.

"If I had known you were coming," said the head of one of the schools, not in Calcutta, "I would have had all the children present."

"I came unannounced purposely to see the work as it is, not as you would wish it had been after I have gone," was the reply. "Where are the children who are not present?"

"About twenty-five have gone to neighboring villages to see their friends and relatives for a week during the vacation. You know that many of the orphans have relatives; sometimes there is a mother or a father who escaped starvation; occasionally a brother or a sister was found alive, having been kept from death by a relative. It seems wise, where it is possible to do so, to keep in touch with these relatives, as our children will soon be growing up and will need friends and companions. In the meantime they are able to exert a good influence over them, teaching them what they themselves have learned."

The Woman's Union Missionary Society has an orphanage in Cawnpore, as well as the one in Calcutta. In the Cawnpore School, we saw the dear girls gathered for evening prayers. Very sweet and winning did the little ones look as they listened attentively to the few words that were spoken and joined heartily in the hymns that were sung. It was not surprising after seeing these children and those in the Calcutta School to hear the missionary say:

"There has been a spirit of inquiry among many of our girls, and a degree of interest in spiritual things that is encouraging." The strain upon these devoted missionaries—physical and mental—can be understood better as one studies their problems with them on the ground. In speaking of deaths from plague in Cawnpore last year, Miss Lillian E. Dietrich, the head of the Mary A. Merriam Orphanage, with fifty CHRISTIAN HERALD children under her care, sent this word to her managers:

"The ravages made by the plague cannot be estimated. Six thousand people left the city, and 130 are buried each day. Our missionaries and native workers are untiring in their efforts to comfort the sufferers and point them to the Lord, but the helplessness of it all weighs upon us, when we realize that many are passing away, without hope for the life hereafter."

And while this consecrated worker is giving her life to save the lives of the orphans under her care, no word of complaint is made. More than she herself knows, the work is taxing her vitality, and greater than she would probably admit, is there need of reinforcement in that station. If a reader of these lines, interested in the work of child saving is able to send an assistant to this orphanage to aid Miss Dietrich, he would be doing much to conserve and lengthen a life which the orphans of Cawnpore will sorely need at its best for many years.

Sad as is the lot of the Indian orphans, when one thinks of the love and care bestowed upon them by the missionaries and their assistants, representing in part the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and compares their surroundings with those of the children not orphans, he sees that there is some recompense. Look at this picture drawn by Miss Roderick, another worker among the children of Allahabad:

"Bengali babies are to be pitied; their wardrobe consists of a few garments like short primitive night-dresses, and one dress for best. In nearly every house is to be seen a low cot or swinging cradle in which the baby takes its mid-day nap. Within the last few years, it has been thought necessary by the Bengalis to educate their daughters, but they are not willing to spend any money for it. The old system was to train girls to be housewives, not scholars, though tradition gives a few names of women who attained to great eminence as such. Bengali girls are quick at learning, and it is not their fault when they arrive at the age of womanhood only partially educated, for, if allowed to attend school, they can only do so up to the age of ten, for at that age they are married, and then, if of high caste, on no account appear in public. In character, the Bengali girl is gentle and quiet, pleasant and graceful in manner and lovable on the whole.

"After death, no loving memorial is reared in memory of the departed. The body is carried by the nearest relatives for cremation to the banks of a river, and the ashes are thrown into it. The religion of their forefathers, which they cling to so blindly, has no comfort for them when the hand of death casts its dread shadow over a household:

"And are they dust, and dust must we become?
Or are they living in some unknown clime?
Shall we regain them in that far-off home?
And live anew beyond the waves of time?"

It is not possible for CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans, trained as they are, ever to express such a hopeless yearning as this poor Hindu woman has done in these lines.

A GOSPEL CAMPAIGN IN TENTS

IN the summer of 1899, the Presbyterians of Philadelphia, inspired by an address of the late D. L. Moody, undertook a series of evangelistic meetings in tents, in various parts of the city. The success of this work was so great that similar movements were inaugurated in many cities throughout the United States. These facts being brought to the attention of the General Assembly, that body appointed an Evangelistic Committee, whose work in every section of the country where the Presbyterian Church is established, has been a vital and quickening influence.

Thorough and elaborate plans have now been made for the sixth season of this work in Philadelphia. It has been carried on with increasing scope each summer, until, from three tents in 1899, the movement last summer included seven tents, with open-air meetings at many other points; twenty-nine different locations being occupied, with an aggregate reported attendance of 415,152 at 1,312 different meetings. Eighty ministers and evangelists took part in proclaiming the Word, and seventy-three other helpers were actively engaged.

Tent and open air meetings were arranged for the week commencing June 19, at Twenty-fourth and Wharton, and Twenty-third and Montgomery Avenue, Eighteenth and Fitzwater Streets, and Race Street Pier. Other locations to be occupied during the summer for Tent services or as open-air preaching stations, are Seventeenth and Wolf Streets, Belgrade and Neff Streets; Frankford Avenue and Cambria Street; Starr Garden Park, McPherson Square, Penn Treaty Park, Independence Square, City Hall Plaza, and various other points. Among the evangelists engaged in the work are Rev. E. L. Hyde, Prof. and Mrs. J. J. Lowe, Rev. A. H. Kaylor, Geo. W. Jacoby, Rev. Thomas Houston, Rev. John H. Elliott, and Rev. Daniel S. Toy. The Committee has been fortunate in enlisting the aid of Rev. Francis L. Patton, D.D., President of Princeton Theological Seminary, to speak at several meetings.

Evangelist S. H. Hadley, of the famous Water Street Mission, New York City, Rev. E. L. Hyde, Prof. and Mrs. J. J. Lowe, evangelists and singers, are enlisted in the work. Among the Philadelphia churches which devote some of their services to the interests of this work, are Walnut Street Church, Rev. S. W. Dana, D.D.; West Hope Church, Rev. Charles E. Bronson, D.D.; Northminster Church, Rev. Jos-

No collections are taken at any of the evangelistic meetings held under the auspices of this committee. The expenses (which amounted last year to about $14,000), are met by personal contributions, and the merit of the work and its great results should appeal forcibly to all interested in the progress of the kingdom. The committee this year consists of the following Presbyterian ministers and laymen, representing the Social Union and the two Presbyteries: Chairman, John H. Converse; vice-chairman, Rev. Wm. P. Fulton, D.D., treasurer, Wm. H. Scott; secretary, Rev. J. B. Howell; general superintendent, Rev. James B. Ely, D.D.; Revs. Wm. Hutton, D.D., J. Gray Bolton, D.D., H. Clay Ferguson, Wm. B. Gospel Tent Work in Hackensack, N. J.

A SUCCESSFUL Gospel work in the open air has been conducted in Hackensack, N. J., during the month of June, in a series of tent meetings, which closed June 26. In these meetings, Evangelist George H. Palmer and wife, of Newburgh, N. Y., have been assisted by Miss Emma Ward, of Cornwall-on-Hudson. They have preached to crowds in a large tent in the centre of the town, adjoining the Armory. Many have heard the Gospel proclaimed on the street corners, as well as in the tent, by the local pastors who have co-operated in these meetings. A string orchestra made the musical features of these meetings very attractive. Visits to factories were made at the noon hour. The jail and the various city institutions were also visited. Among the many who heard the Gospel preached during these meetings, there were some who made public confession, thus furnishing evidence of the fact that work had been owned and blessed to the saving of souls.

Triumphs of Faithfulness

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

A GOGI OF INDIA

IN some lands, the mother of a reigning sovereign is called the "queen mother." It is a position of large power and influence. Si Ann, of China, is an illustration of this in our time. Maacah, the great granddaughter of King David, was the queen mother during the reign of Abijah, the son of Rehoboam. But when Asa, her grandson, began to rule, she was brought down from her high pedestal, because she had set up idols in the land. Asa cut down her idols (II. Chr. 15:16). He had been ridding the whole land of idols, and did not stop short at the royal household. He not only broke down the idols, but bade the people return to the true God, which they did, and God gave them the blessing of peace and prosperity. In these times, however, it seemed necessary to be prepared for defence, and so he organized an army of five hundred and eighty thousand men. After ten years of peace, King Zerah, of Ethiopia, with his host of one million men and three hundred chariots, came against King Asa. The Ethiopians numbered almost two to one, but Asa was not dismayed; he set his host in array, and called upon the God of battles for help.

Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power: help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude. O Lord, thou art our God; let not man prevail against thee.

And he did not call in vain, for the Lord smote the Ethiopians with defeat.

Illustration and Application

This story presents four great themes: 1. Triumph over bad heredity. 2. Triumph over popular idolatry. 3. Triumphs of prosperous peace. 4. Triumphs in serious war.

Sunday School teachers can not wisely ignore the fact that some children of bad parents have a most dangerous heredity. The tactful teacher will not say so directly to those thus handicapped, but will seize such an opportunity as this story affords to show that a son need not repeat the sins of his father. Asa's grandmother was a promoter of idolatry, and his royal father was either wicked or weak, and therefore made no resistance to her wrong-doing.

How Asa came to be such a strong and righteous young man in spite of such blood, we can not explain. Perhaps he had a good mother or a good teacher, or both. He destroyed not only outside idols, but also those in his own royal household, and put out of office his grandmother, who had ruled as "queen mother," because of her sin. This throws important light on the commandment, "Obey your parents in the Lord." In every community there are children who must choose between obeying a righteous God or unrighteous parents. Not in heathen lands alone, but in every place the warning of Christ is needed by some. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me." No one can excuse his own wrong-doing by saying, "My father or my mother told me to do it." "Everyone shall give account of himself to God." Abraham and Gideon, as well as Asa, are our exemplars in repudiating family idols to stand with God. Missionary history abounds with instances of that heroic act.

One of the most perfect parallels, since idolatry in Asa's day, often included the sin of impurity, is the case of Khama, a Christian chief of the Bamangwato people of South Africa. His father lived and died a heathen, but Khama learned of the great salvation through a native Christian, and was afterwards further instructed and baptized by a Moravian missionary. British missionaries taught him the way of Christ more perfectly, until his countenance came to be expressive of great refinement and intelligence. His heathen father was displeased by his change of religion. He bought him a second wife while the first still lived, and said, "Take this woman." The son replied firmly to the command of one who was both his father and his king, "I refuse, on account of the word of God.

*International Sunday School lesson for July 17, on "Asa's Good Reign," II. Chronicles 14:1-12. Golden text: "Help us, O Lord, our God, for we rest on thee," II. Chr. 14:11.

Lay the hardest task upon me, to hunt elephants for ivory, or any service you can name, for a token of my obedience, but I can not take the daughter of Pelutana to wife." His father sought to kill him. In turn he had opportunities such as David had to kill Saul, to retaliate, but did not. When his father's death made him chief, he became widely known as a "wise and brave Christian ruler." Idols were of course destroyed. Trading and traveling on the Lord's Day were stopped, and a prohibitory liquor law against beer as well as rum, was made and enforced, despite most earnest efforts to break it down by bribes and smuggling. His example and efforts led very many of his people to be earnest Christians. He might be called the King Asa of South Africa, and his story might well bring the blush of shame to many a civilized ruler and citizen, who has followed a parent's bad example or sacrificed home or the Lord's Day or temperance, for the sake of pleasure or money or power.

Missionary history also affords striking parallels to Asa's rescue of his whole nation from idolatry. In the Fiji Islands there was a great stone, at which human sacrifices were offered for many years by the cannibal idolaters, who dashed the heads of the victims against the stone, and leaving the blood there for their god, carried away the body for their own feast. Thousands were thus sacrificed; but for a whole generation no blood has stained the stone, and it has of late been taken into the great church at Bau, and used as a baptismal font, the top having been hollowed for this purpose—a slight symbol of the change wrought in those transformed islands, where public bells ring the daily call to family worship, which is offered in almost every house.

As Henry Drummond was steaming away from the New Hebrides, after having visited the missions there, he was asked by a fellow passenger, who had been visiting the Islanders for a very different purpose, what good the missionary had been to those people. "My dear young man," said Drummond, "only for the missionary, you and I, instead of being in this cabin, would probably, by this time, to God's command, should be, that we can thus save our brothers from the present hell of superstitious fears, and hope and joy in their place. Let me give some samples of the bodily misery that the Gogis of India inflict on the selves, to please their cruel gods and to win sainthood a charitable support.

Here is a man, who for months has tied one of his arms a pillar or tree, until quite withered. There is another who seats himself on the open road, between four or five fires the hottest months of the year; his skin on his chest and arms hanging down in flakes. There is another who performs the water penance, by standing, in the cold season, in the river up to his waist, from midnight till dawn. Another has taken a vow of never rising from his knees; the result being that his thighs and legs are reduced to the size of sticks, and his knee-caps abnormally enlarged. Another is seen loaded with heavy chains, and wandering about with these where he goes. The railway company, objecting to his surplus luggage, have him weighed with the chains, and charged extra fare. Another slashes himself with a knife, and threatens to commit suicide in front of a shop, unless the shopkeeper gives him not less than a rupee (about one shilling and fourpence). When asked why they suffer these tortures, the answer is, "To kill the ten members of the body and to gain merit." The best English equivalent for the expression would be, "To mortify the flesh." Very few among them would do it to attain to a state of holiness. They cannot be achieved until the last member is "killed," that is, the greed for money. As long as they accept money for their penance, the Gogis cannot attain to a higher degree of holiness; but a few refuse to take money, and thereby (according to their religious beliefs) entitled to enter a higher stage, called the stage of "indifference," in which the devotee shows himself quite indifferent to hunger, thirst, heat and cold. He is then termed by the Hindus paramhans, which means "a great swan" (an Indian sacred bird) because, in their opinion he soars higher than other human beings. He is worshiped by his colleagues, while the people prostrate themselves before him. Most of the Gogis, however, spend their ill-gotten gains drinking and smoking most obnoxious and intoxicating things; and fleecing many of the simple peasants, who come as pilgrims from great distances to the sacred shrines, and to admire these so-called saints and holy men in their deeds.

"So they built and prospered." The whole Christian world should pray and work for peace between Japan and Russia, which, if left to fight out their quarrel, will probably have the bloodiest war in history. We do not again charter the Grosser Kurfurst, for time for a round-world cruise in the interest of peace, to ask nations to become a United States of the World, with a supreme court at the Hague, which all countries should agree to refer all their quarrels, just as individuals in civilized communities have substituted law for war? We begin with, let all Christians frown on the fallacy that big armaments are a "guarantee of peace."

As well say a bar-room full of rowdies with boots are full of bowie-knives and whose hip-pockets are crowded with revolvers, is a "guarantee of peace." An interesting use is made of one of the warships of the British navy. Laden with cocoanuts instead of cannon-balls, she is cruising among islands of the South Pacific, plucking the nuts and other fruits on all islands which are in lack of them. The idea is that groves of cocoa palms will serve as guides to navigation, and will afford some shelter and maintenance to shipwrecked crews, besides, of course, increasing the value of the islands, and their fitness for colonization. Great Britain's motto, "God and my right," might give place to a motto for every nation, "God and my duty." It may sometimes be both our duty and our privilege to sacrifice "rights,"—though never right—for the sake of peace and the general good. Mazzini urged on contending warring men this same thought in his Duties of Man. He would have the workman first of all do his full duty, and then he can more reasonably talk of his "rights." Joseph in slavery and even in prison, did his duty as a workman, and he got no wages at all. That proved the shortest road to getting his rights. Let us pray and work for both industrial and international peace, to be secured through Him who cradled coronation song, that was never sung in vain, "Peace on earth."

But in Asa's time, good men believed that war was sometimes necessary, and it is instructive to see how in war we relied not on the "strongest battalions," but on the omnipotent God. It is by no means true that the strongest army navy has always won.

"LET US BUILD CITIES AND MAKE ABOUT THEM WALLS AND TOWERS, GATES AND BARS."

have been inside some of those savages, as you call them, who waved us such an affectionate farewell from their shores."

Even Matthew Arnold said: "Show me ten square miles outside of Christianity where the life of man or the virtue of woman is safe, and I'll throw over Christianity at once."

It took great courage in Asa to attack idolatry, for it had become the popular religion. A like case was that of a British missionary who ventured alone into the interior of Arabia, where he was seized and detained by the retainers of a Mohammedan chief named Johar. Presently the chief himself came with an excited crowd. He said to the missionary: "You are come into the land of the Moslem. Here are no Christians; we do not allow them; we are taught to kill them. I ask you to give up your religion and become one of us. What is your answer? Repeat the witness: There is no God but God, and Mahommed is the prophet of God." After a moment of silent prayer for courage, the missionary, seven hundred miles from any other Christian, made answer: "If you were in the land of the Christians, guest of our queen, and she bade you give up your religion, would you do it?" "No, not if she ordered my head cut off. Again, which do you think best to do—to please God or man?" "To please God." The chief, nevertheless, went away much displeased, and the missionary was told by the chief's attendants, that he was in great danger. But on further consideration the chief seemed to appreciate the missionary's brave words, and in a few days sent him away safely to Jerusalem, in his own caravan.

Is the World Growing Worse or Better?

If we read the daily newspapers, and see in a single week the story of a foolish old man who has squandered a great fortune on a wicked woman; the desperate quarrel of a rich and highly educated married pair, each violently striving to possess the poor little children who belong to both, and the murder or suicide of a reckless man who had wandered into life's worst labyrinth of vice, to say nothing of other dark impulses, we shall fancy that the world is growing worse. We forget that our present means of communication and publication, enable us to look at the panorama of the evil's doings as we never could have done at any previous time in the Christian era.

So long as human nature exists on this earth, and until the promised millennium arrives, there will be public greed and private cupidity. Rapacity will stalk to and fro, great nations will play a great game of grab or great stakes, wars will be waged with fury, and peace will be bought at a terrible price of blood and treasure. Infamy and treachery will work in uncanny places and abate their victims as surely as the assassin stabbed the king who sat in his summer palace away back in the early annals of the Old Testament. But look at the other side of the picture.

Never has there been a time when so many agencies for alleviating human suffering were as active and well equipped as at this very day. Hospital nurses and doctors in the battlefield; hospitals in the great cities; fresh air homes for the little children of the crowded towns; asylums and orphanages without number; dispensaries and infirmaries for the poor; a benign charity everywhere exercised, and kind hearts and hands dispensing alms with generous haste.

Never were missions so generally sustained, nor so universal as at this hour. Everywhere on the globe there is an open door for the Gospel. The missionary, teacher, evangelist or physician, finds an entrance in old lands where heathenism has been for ages firmly entrenched, and from those old lands, eager youths come thronging to ours, that they may be taught in our schools, and breathe our atmosphere. The word of God is translated into every known dialect and language. A cordon of true hearts around the earth, is devoted to the service of the Lord.

No matter what we read, or see, or hear of vice and crime, there are homes beyond our country where domestic tranquillity is never broken, where contentment reigns, where love is the supreme motive and children are trained in all that makes for good citizenship and honorable maturity. Perhaps the combats are fiercer and the issues more tremendous than in an elder day, but knightly men and gentle women still live, still set good examples, and yet brook no stain on their escutcheon.

The world is growing better, not worse. We have no reason for aught save a cheering optimism. Life is full of grand opportunities. Patriotism is not dead. We love our country and our homes and our God, and the love of the nation and of the world is with us, and though there may be episodes of discouragement, on the whole, the hosts of Jehovah are winning in every hard-pressed fight.

If You Take Summer Boarders

If you have decided to take summer boarders, and they are coming from the city, bear in mind that they simply loathe and detest flies. Many a beautiful country home that opens its doors to paying guests, people who expect to spend money generously, and do not naggle over terms, never secures the same party a second time, from this cause alone. Flies in the dining-room make the very nicest meal a horror. Flies in the milk pitcher or in the coffee cannot be tolerated by dainty folk, whose city homes are screened so well that flies do not invade them. Flies walking over one's face at dawn are an abomination. I am not sure that mosquitoes are a worse torment than are flies.

Screen every door and every window with wire netting, or else with mosquito netting. This is precaution number one, and the advice is worth its weight in gold to the country hostess. Mosquito netting is not expensive, but it means

MORNING PRAYERS IN THE FAMILY OF SEBASTIAN BACH

Praise unto Him, our gracious King, whose Name all noble minstrels sound;

To whom the harps of heaven ring — who makes each home a holy ground.

Here, old and young uplift the voice, and in Jehovah's sight, rejoice.

comfort, and even luxury, to those who occupy the bedrooms, as well as to those who sit at the table.

About the beds; let them be good of their kind. Every bedstead should have a spring, and the mattresses, though perhaps not made of hair, should be elastic and clean, sweet-smelling and inviting to refreshing sleep. Feather-beds and straw-beds are still found in some parts of this country. They are not fit for sleeping on, and should not be offered to boarders. Every bed should be provided with sheets large enough to fold well in at the bed's foot, and wide enough to fall below the sides of the bed, and for other cover there should be either light wool blankets, or light spreads. Plenty of water and plenty of towels, renewed daily, are another necessity.

The table should be furnished with neat white table-cloths and napkins, and with whole china, washed with scrupulous care. An elaborate bill of fare is not essential, but good tea, good coffee, good bread, and good butter are indispensable. Note the adjective. Sour bread, poor butter, mediocre tea, and muddy coffee find a place on some tables, and boarders groan, suffer, and leave as soon as possible.

Never mind whether or not you have rich pastry. Let your meats be the best you can secure, your chickens tender, your vegetables fresh, and serve rich milk and thick cream. Your guests will celebrate your praises far and near, and you will fill your house another season.

Woman's Hair Her Glory

A PRETTY story is told about the great Duke of Marlborough. Magnificent soldier as he was, victorious on many a hard-fought battle-field, he had at home an antagonist who gave him much trouble in the meeting her various moods and tempers. His wife was a shrew, a fiery termagant, with a sharp tongue and a choice vocabulary. Yet he loved her deeply, and was very proud of her radiant beauty. His especial delight was her long, rich, and splendid hair, trailing around her like a silken mantle, when unbound, and piling on her head like a coronet when arranged for state occasions. One day, in a fit of passion, to spite her husband, the Duchess of Marlborough seized a pair of shears and cut off her hair, leaving it where the Duke would see it when he came in. No doubt she had her after-regrets, shorn of so much loveliness by her own rashness, but if she thought to be reproached or scolded, or to receive any word of comment from her lord, she was justly punished. Never, till the day of his death, did the Duke so much as seem to know what had happened. He did not even look as though he missed the lady's golden tresses. But when death had taken him hence, the story of his silent self-control was manifest. In a drawer of his desk, where he had kept it under lock and key, was found the shining coils of the hair that Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, had cut off, that she might give him pain.

Speaking of beautiful hair, why do you, dear lady, so often cut that of your little daughter? You probably fancy that frequent cutting will add to its length and thickness when she is grown. This is a mistake. Hair darkens in hue and coarsens in texture if too often cut, and a monthly clipping at the ends is enough to keep it vigorous, as a rule. The great necessity is to brush the hair well, and to cleanse the scalp thoroughly. Dirt on the head is as deleterious as dirt on the body. To wash the head too often is unwise, as it takes away the supply of natural oil, but it should be given a daily and very thorough brushing, to maintain its strength.

If the hair is turning gray earlier than is desirable, use a lotion made by steeping dried sage-leaves, as you would steep tea. This may be bottled and kept on the dressing-table. Gray or white hair is really a beauty when the face is still young, and it positively softens and beautifies an old face. An elderly woman looks more distinguished, and therefore more pleasing with silver hair than with raven locks. If the hair is conspicuously thin, and the parting shows too much of the scalp, a lady should, by all means, adopt the graceful fashion of wearing a square of soft lace, not a cap, but rather a head-dress, and she will thus meet time half-way and disarm him, ere he attempt to despoil her of charm.

An old family formula for falling hair is: yellow dock-root, one pound, boiled in five pints of water until reduced to one pint. To this may be added an ounce of pulverized borax, a half ounce of coarse salt, three ounces of sweet oil, and a pint of bay rum. A little lavender may be added, or a few drops of rose-water, by way of perfume.

Accidents and Precautions

Many accidents, of which we read in the daily papers, are obviously due to the foolhardy recklessness of our people, who take risks without proper thought. In the frantic rush for a boat or train, no heed is taken of the automobile or car hurrying on one from the side concealed from view, as one alights from his own conveyance. Every summer the list of accidents on the water, to swimmers and bathers, is formidable, and there are few days in city life when unidentified persons are not carried to hospitals, maimed or dying.

Each of us going about in a large town, or traveling anywhere, should carry on the clothing or in the pockets the names and addresses of friends to whom word may be sent in case anything happens. This is an easy thing to do, and it may save untold anxiety to those who love us, if we meet some unforeseen disaster.

WOMAN'S LIFE IN MOROCCO

LIFE presents strange contrasts in Morocco's capital, with its palaces and its poverty, its beautiful gardens, and filthy, narrow streets. So ancient is the city of Tangier that its origin is lost in the ages that have past since Morocco was magnificent in its grandeur, its architecture, and the splendor of its riches. Its history can be traced back to more than eight hundred years. It was then a city of great importance and size, containing upwards of 100,000 buildings, and now it is no more than a straggling, half-ruined town.

There is a condition of continual revolt in some parts of the empire. In the villages, women welcome the traveler with a shrill cry, made by quickly moving their tongues between their lips, and boys shout after the Christian, "May Allah burn your grandfather and grandmother," so great is the contempt of this people for the foreigner. They have no ambition, no desire for education, and most of the schooling which the young Moors get is a knowledge of the Koran, which is literally drummed into them by the old thelab, who, sitting cross-legged, shouts verse after verse, and woe to the unlucky urchin who makes a mistake in repeating, for he gets a smart blow over the head, or wherever the stick happens to strike. The Moor says this education was good enough for his father and grandfather, and they were good men. Why should he want any thing different?

The Moorish countrywoman's dress consists of skirt and body hanging from the shoulders, caught there by two silver brooches, joined by a silver chain hanging across the chest. The garment is fastened at the waist by a colored band, either of silk or cotton, and over all is worn an outer garment, called a haik, made of woolen cloth. The costume of the townswomen is much more gorgeous, their garments being of silk and brocade, while their ears and necks are hung with silver and gold jewelry, the weight of which would seem overpowering. The hair is worn in two long plaits, lengthened by interwoven black thread, while lips and cheeks are thickly coated with paint.

The gardens are very beautiful, and from the turrets on the houses of the wealthy, there are views in some directions so lovely, that one seems to be overlooking a city of gardens. In another quarter, lie masses of white, flat roofs, covering the dwellings of the poor. The scene from the Sultan's palace is indescribably beautiful. Away beyond the gardens, lie the plains, the forests of pine-trees and the snow-capped mountains. While the Sultan sits in splendor in his palace, his subjects, many of them, are most abjectly poor, ignorant, dirty and ragged; but they do not seem to care. Indifference to everything, except the advent of a Christian, is their chief characteristic.

When the Sultan goes forth on state occasions, it is in great magnificence and with splendid pomp and ceremony. He is a handsome man, very dark-skinned, with jet black beard and mustache. His hands are small and well shaped, and his every movement is majestic. The ladies of the harem are very stout and not beautiful, according to our ideas. The dancing girls

Government is the house of Abdsadh, Governor of Tangier who is now deposed, and his uncle and relations, who have held the governorship of Tangier for generations. Abdsadh and his people have for years persecuted with fire and sword my tribe, killed our young boys, mutilated our children, robbed us, and disregarded all the principles of our religion. For a long time I considered the advisability of raiding Tangier and retaliating on the Governor, but I saw difficulties.

owing to the presence of a large number of foreigners of all nations assembled at Tangier. Not wishing to offend the Powers, I decided to go to Tangier and carry away a European (foreigner) of standing.

I expect the new Powers to stand between me and the people. I must be a just man, if there is no justice with the new Government. I warn the Government that there is danger of renewal of the present trouble. Mr. Perdicaris is well and safe. I want for nothing except to see his wife.

Raisuli, or more properly, Rais Uli, the first name being sort of title, meaning chief or leader—is an astonishing sort of man, or would be, he were not a native of a country that has been standing still, retrograding for centuries. It is certainly very much out of the ordinary brigand way to rush into prison in explanation of high-handed doing, which certainly has little of the earmarks of twentieth century progress. Missionary Weiss writes from Tangier, under date June 8, as follows:

Yesterday, June 7, the Prince of Wales, one of the newest battleships belonging to England, arrived at this port. She was saluted by the port officials and also by the American ships in port. News comes from Rabat, a seaport not far from Tangier, that a Spaniard was shot and killed there by a fanatical Moor, who bought the gun for the purpose of killing a Christian. To-day, a Spanish fleet is expected at Tangier, so altogether things look very warlike here. News came last night from the mountains that Perdicaris was sick, and means were tried to get a doctor to go and see him; but up to this time no one has gone. I went to the office of Mr. Gummere, our American Consul-General, to get his advice about remaining on the mountains, for we do not live so very close to Tangier. He told me I had better bring my family in. I may send my family to Gibraltar for a time, while I remain in Tangier.

Later dispatches bring from Tangier, the assurance that all arrangements have now been made for paying ransom demanded by Raisuli. A spot has been selected where the Moorish prisoners demanded by the brigand may be turned over to him, and where $20,000 of ransom will be paid in cash. The remainder of ransom of $55,000 will be paid in checks on the Tangier bank. The place designated for the exchange of prisoners is about six hours' journey from Tangier, and plans are carried out, and there is no treachery on the parts of the brigand band, Mr. Perdicaris and his sons will soon be among their friends. The naval officials are upon the lookout for any act of treachery.

are very graceful and go through intricate movements, balancing a set of tea-things upon their heads. Tea in Morocco is made in a peculiar way. The pot is filled with sugar; a handful of green tea is thrown in, and then boiling water is poured over the mixture. It is left to stand a minute, then the first glass is thrown away and the host drinks the next, to show the guests there is no poison in the decoction. A sprig of mint or lemon verbena sometime lends an added flavor. It is etiquette to drink at least three glasses of tea.

The mountaineers surpass the lowlanders in physique, being cleaner and more picturesque. They live by stealing cattle, and pay no taxes. There are no marriages, as the members of one band are constantly stealing the women of another band. Their women are taught to dance, and are clothed most gorgeously, with golden beads, chains, bracelets, and anklets. Their silken head-scarves are very beautiful, and they do not hide their faces. They are far better treated than Moorish wives in town.

The Case of Mr. Perdicaris

Raisuli, the Moorish brigand, who kidnapped Mr. Ion Perdicaris, and his step-son, Mr. Varley, a few weeks ago, and who still holds them in captivity, makes an interesting, an ingenious defence of his act. He says in substance that he does not hate Christian Europeans, and does not want to drive them from Morocco. After declaring that "such speaking is lies," Raisuli says:

The cause of the present trouble between me and the

SUNSHINERS IN CONVENTION

THE Sixth Annual Convention of the International Sunshine Society recently held in New York was most successful, and fully 800 officers and delegates from all over the land were present. The meetings were held in the Waldorf Astoria. In the evening a reception was attended by fully three thousand persons. This was followed by a musical under the direction of Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp, Chairman of the Board of Directors. It may interest Sunshine members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Branch to hear of some of the work done by the Society as reported at the annual.

States represented by State leaders in the receiving line were as follows: New York, three division presidents; Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, New Hampshire, Vermont, Wisconsin, the Republic of Panama, and 2,800 branches were reported as active and in good standing.

Interesting features reported as already established by the different branches are as follows: Libraries for Alaska; Sunshine Rest Home for women at Hot Springs, Ark., organizing for a Consumptives Home in Arizona; preparing for a Home for Consumptives in California; Sunshine Exchange Bureau in Denver; District Nurses' Association in Derby, Conn.; supporting a hospital ward in Hartford, Conn.; the Fresh Air Home for children in Bridgeport, Conn.; Canada has libraries for the deep sea fishermen, and boys' clubs and reading rooms; Women's Rest Home in New Orleans; the Maine State Wheel Chair Circle and Hospital Work; Cripple Children's Home in Malden, Mass.; kindergartens in Boston and free libraries in towns and headquarters in Massachusetts; Michigan has flower missions established throughout the State; Minnesota, Rest Home for women; Emergency Bureau, St. Louis, Mo.; Nebraska has free libraries and rest rooms for country visitors; New York State, a Sunshine Kindergarten, Hillcrest Sunshine Lodge at Livingston Manor, N. Y., open all the year round; Albany Sunshine Playgrounds; Oklahoma Territory free reading tables; Sunshine Toy Mission in Pittsburg; Sunshine Home for aged men in Memphis, Tenn.; lunch rooms for working girls in Memphis; lunch rooms for girls in Louisiana; Sunshine Home for the blind, in Brownsville, Texas; Sunshine Library, Brattleboro; Sunshine Kindergarten for the blind babies in New York City; Golden Hour Home for girls, New York City (Industrial School), and free libraries furnished in almost every State of the Union; Sunshine Rest Home in Southern Pines, N. C.; free box libraries in Virginia.

Mrs. Alden, in her address of welcome, said: "It is impossible for me to express to you how happy I am to welcome you again to the great Metropolis. We thought last year that the sun was shining about as bright as it could, but this morning the happiness and good cheer I see expressed on the faces before me, indicate that although some of us have passed through great sorrows, our hearts are more aglow with the true spirit of sunshine than ever."

"The reports that you will hear to-day will prove that our progress has been truly wonderful. You will notice that some of the branches have handled quite as much money as that which passed through general headquarters. This is because each year more responsibility is thrown upon the Circles, and headquarters is left with more time to devote to correspondence, which sometimes amounts to five and six hundred letters a day.—Let's ask for general information.

"Instead of having lost any of my army workers, I find that daily the ranks have been added to, and I take this opportunity to thank you all for the hearty co-operation demonstrated during the last year.

"Especially am I grateful to the members of the press, for without their assistance the Society would be crippled indeed. We have forty-one States, with leaders. Seven towns in Canada are organized, represented by five delegates. The President of the Branches in England reports great progress. We have with us to-day delegates from Panama and the West Indies, as well. Delegates have come from as far West as California, East as Maine, North Canada, South Florida, so you see our Sunshine has reached all parts of the world."

The membership report was sent in by Mrs. Emily Elwell, of headquarters. Over a hundred thousand members are enrolled in one cabinet, but large junior Branches are simply enrolled by their Branch presidents.

Aunt Jerushy's Letter

Dear Liddy Jane:

YOU'LL never know jest how glad I wus tu hear from yu via THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Now, is it possible, yu tly du know them air good peeple, what is a f'din' the hungry and a clothin' the naked? t yu wait till I git forehanded enough tu t yu New York. Won't we go tu that air livery Mission meetin'?

But, Liddy Jane, yu wouldn't bleeve how terested Sary Lisabeth is a gittin' since she scribed fur that air CHRISTIAN HERALD. ay, 'twas jest 't'other mornin', as I sot down my rockin' chair by the winder tu rest a f' minutes, I looked out and saw her a cinin'. "I wonder what now," sez I, for er since she sent for and took the paper, s's ben a studyin' of it every odd chance— she never read so much in her life. But, I was a sayin', in she cum, and sez she, unt Jerushy, I most wisht I'd never gone ad took that air paper, fur I'll be poor as s turkey before the year's out, sure's yu l'.

Why, Sary Lisabeth," sez I, "what on th du yu mean? Surely one dollar and a f paid fur a paper big as that, and that yu f fifty-two times a year, can't impoverish y greatly."

No," sez she, "taint that I'm alludin' tu; t that air paper jest goes around this airth untin' out all the poor, naked, oppressed, ervin' critters, and then tells about them in a harrerin way that yu can't help your- sf, and it fairly makes yu feel guilty if yu nt to spend a dollar for anything yu can du hout as well as not, only yu think yu'd le tu have it."

For my part," sez I, "I was a thinkin' I'd id a little sumthin' tu the work at Mont- wn, that air place where they take the poor tement children in the summer tu give them reath of fresh, pure, country air, and a few d square meals. Tu be sure, I can't send y much, but I can help give a cup of cold ter tu a few, and I guess they are glad tu even that. And anyhow, it only takes eedollars tu give a child a trip to Mont- wn, so, Sary Lisabeth, don't yu think yu d I can manage between us, tu make up t amount and send it right away, so as tu l one more of the poor little souls have a fte of what, tu them, will be paradise for a f days."

Well," sez she, "I've ben a savin' up my g money tu git a few little notions I thought like tu have, though of course I can du hout them; and when I come tu think it er, I s'pose it would hardly be right tu go l spend it for things I don't raily need, ile so many of my feller-critters is a sufferin' the necessities of life. I've got a dollar and ten cents saved, and I might as well give it tu yu now, for I have it in my pocket, tied up in the corner of my handkercher. I guess 'tis no use tu try tu squirm out of it, as long as I read that air CHRISTIAN HERALD, so here it is. To be sure, a dollar and ten cents ain't much, but 'twill help tu stay their stum- mucks a little while, so take it and send it right along with yours. If them air hens had a layed a little better, I might a had more, but they're a gitten kind of old. But du yu know, Aunt Jerushy," sez she, "there's many a dol- lar wasted that had better go for some of these sort of subjects? Why, I was into a house jest 't'other day—I might as well say right out—'twas Tom Hirten's. I was a tellin' somethin' about what I'd ben a readin' in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I kinder hinted plain 's I dare, about them givin' a little sumthin', but I was very soon given to understand that they had enough tu du tu feed and clothe their own family, and I de- clare if I didn't see enough wasted while I was there tu keep a half dozen poor children from starvin' for a week; tu say nothin' of the feathers and flummery them air Hirten girls fly when they go out."

"Yes," sez I, "I know, Sary Lisabeth, they air a very extravagant family, from the oldest tu the youngest, and care little for the cry of the poor. They may yet cry themselves, and not be heard. But they're not the only ones, Sary Lisabeth, that might, by a little con- trivance and forethought, have sumthin' tu give. I'll jest tell yu, but yu needn't say nothin' about it. I was asked over to Mahaly Ellen's last Christmas time tu stay a week, and du yu know, I jest felt like sayin' sum- thin', when I see what a lot of money was wasted in Christmas presents that was of no airthy use. And they not very well tu du, nather. But I thought the most rediklous of all, was the present they giv the old grand- mother, on the father's side, who lives there. Now what du yu s'pose it was?"

"I dunno," sez she, "less 'twas a picture hat."

No," sez I, "twasn't that, but 'twould a- been jest about as useful to the old lady if it had ben, but sure's yu live, if they didn't go and make her a present of a bottle of sozo- dont, and she ninety-three years old and not a tooth in her head, not even a false one."

But I must write my letter before the mail goes out, so's tu git the money there soon's possible, "fur, Sary Lisabeth," sez I, "yu know, sumtimes the King's business requires haste."

Well, she went home, and I writ it, and I s'pose they've got it before this.

And now, Liddy Jane, I must close, hopin' tu hear from yu soon.

I remain your lovin'

The Boy Giant, Joseph Schippers

OW and at all times and by all nations, fairy tales and romances have played a y important part. Thus the Bible tells us Emim and Enakim, as also the giant Go- th. Well known are also the giants and clops of Grecian mythology, besides the is of the giant Burr, Asen, Odin, Wili, and e. The most prominent figure in German thology is the giant Rubezahl, and in ickerick Ruckert's tale, The Giants and the varf, we read, "The giant's daughter went, at for a joke, to the high castle, where ther Giant sat."

There are even now people far above the normal size. The Chinaman Chang-Yu-Sing, who visited Europe in 1878, was 2.36 metres high. After him, and a centimetre taller, came Joseph Drasal, from Holleschau, in Mahren. Bigger than he was Marie Wedde, born in Benkendorf, in Halle. She was 2.56 metres high. The Arabian, Hassan Ali (dis- covered by Henry Moller), also made a re- markable showing, being 2.40 metres in height, and the giant boy, Karl Ullrich, from Gross- mohnau, at the age of fourteen, was 1.87 metres tall. A metre is equal to 39.37 inches.

The latest acquisition of the Berlin Mu- seum is "Big Joseph." Joseph Schippers (his father's name was also Joseph Schippers), was born in Munchen-Gladbach, April 15, 1888, and is the son of a butcher. At the age of twelve he had to be kept out of school on ac- count of his height. He was at that time 1.90 metres tall. Now he is 2.17 metres (about 7 feet 1 1/2 inches) tall, and if all signs do not deceive, he will yet have the honor of being the tallest person in the world. He is appar- ently normally developed otherwise. Dressed in a blue sailor suit, with a youthful face, fresh, ruddy cheeks, blue eyes, and blond curly hair, he does not make an unfavorable impression. He is the only one of his family who has grown to this height. His parents, as well as his brothers and sisters, numbering ten, are all perfectly normal.

LIVELY 70

Right Food Makes Young of the Aged.

When one is lively and a hard worker at this age there is something interesting to tell and the Princeton lady who has passed this mark explains how her wonderful health is due to the food she eats.

"I am past seventy years of age and up to five years ago suffered terribly with chronic stomach trouble, heart disease, and was generally as weak as you will find sick old women of 65. At that time I began to use Grape-Nuts food, and from the very first it began to build me up. Soon I came to a condition of perfect health, because I can always digest this food, and it is full of nourishment. All my heart and stomach troubles are gone. I soon gained between 15 and 20 pounds, and have never lost it. I can now do a hard day's work.

"Certainly this is the greatest food I ever struck. It gave me strength, and ambition, and courage, and I try to do all the good I can telling people what it has done for me. Many of my neighbors use it and are doing fine.

"I had the grip the latter part of the winter, and for four weeks ate absolutely nothing but Grape-Nuts, and came out of the sickness nicely. That will show you how strong and sturdy I am. Truly it is wonderful food to do such things for one of my age." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Delicious, crisp, nutty flavored Grape-Nuts. Trial 10 days proves things.

NEW SAYINGS OF JESUS*

NEWS that another papyrus containing more Sayings of our Lord, had been found at Oxyrhynchus, was published in this journal several weeks ago. The American branch of the Oxford University Press has now issued a small booklet, containing a facsimile of the papyrus and a translation of the Sayings, with a critical commentary by Dr. Bernard P. Grenfell, Lucy W. Drexel and Dr. Arthur S. Hunt. With these is the text and translation of a fragment of a lost Gospel, which was found at the same time and place.

It will be remembered that in 1897 Drs. Grenfell and Hunt found at Oxyrhynchus, while excavating under the auspices of the Egypt Exploration Fund, a large quantity of ancient papyri, one of which contained eight Sayings of our Lord. That now discovered contains five Sayings, with an introduction, stating that they were addressed to the Apostle Thomas and some one else, whose name has disappeared from the papyrus. There are many other words also missing from the papyrus, the edges of which have been worn or torn off. The editors suggest in some instances the words that are lost, and give their reasons for thinking that they are correct.

The Sayings are written on the back of a document containing a survey of various pieces of land, a practice common in the earlier centuries of our era. The character of the writing of the survey indicates that it was written first and that it was probably of considerable length. The editors have no doubt that both were written prior to 300 A.D. This is about the same date as that of the manuscript discovered seven years ago, and though the new fragment is shorter than that, its value is enhanced by the introduction, which intimates the source of the report, though it does not appear whether Thomas or the other disciple was the one responsible.

Each of the Sayings is introduced by

*New Sayings of Jesus and Fragment of a Lost Gospel, edited with translation and commentary by Dr. Bernard P. Grenfell, Lucy Wharton Drexel and Dr. Arthur S. Hunt. Pp. 47. Price 40 cents. Published by the Oxford University Press, 91 and 93 Fifth Avenue, New York.

the words: "Jesus saith." The editors believe that the peculiarity of tense was deliberately adopted by the writer to give greater impressiveness to the Sayings, and that it indicates an original report, rather than a quotation from some earlier Gospel. It would appear, however, that there were other sources for some of the Sayings. The first, for example, which is similar to the expression in Matthew 7:7, "Seek, and ye shall find," etc., was contained almost exactly in the lost Gospel According to the Hebrews, as we know from a quotation by Clement from that Gospel.

The second Saying, which is the longest in the collection, is mutilated in several places. It is as follows, the words in brackets being those suggested by the editors as being probably the lost words:

"Jesus saith [ye ask? Who are those] that draw us [to the kingdom, if] the kingdom is in heaven? . . . the fowls of the air, and all beasts that are under the earth or upon the earth, and the fishes of the sea [these are they which draw] you, and the Kingdom of Heaven is within you; and whoever shall know himself shall find it. [Strive therefore] to know yourselves, and ye shall be aware that ye are the sons of the [Almighty] Father; [and] ye shall know that ye are in [the city of God], and ye are [the city]."

The resemblance of this Saying to the words of our Lord (Luke 17:21), "The kingdom of God is within you" will, at once be apparent and it may have been another version of the same Saying. The third Saying bears a similar resemblance to Mark 10:31, and the fourth resembles Matt. 10:36. The fifth Saying is so illegible that the editors do not attempt to reconstruct it, but it is evidently similar to Matt. 19:16-22, though from the new papyrus it would appear that the questions Jesus answered were put by the disciples.

There is also in the book a translation of some fragments of a lost Gospel which was evidently in the hands of Clement when he wrote his Epistles. They belong also to the third century and are believed to be part of the Gospel, according to the Egyptians, but they are so mutilated as to render positive identification impossible.

How Grandfather Pettingill Celebrated

aped out of the wagon like a boy and in with the gleeful shout, "Come, Mary Ann, you and the boy, and help grandfather celebrate his independence." "Why, it's grandpa!" cried Ross, setting to a whole bunch of firecrackers in the excitement of the moment. "Why it is father, bless his dear old art," echoed Mary Ann, jumping up from the sewing machine and running to meet him with outstretched arms. "That's it, that's it, deary," cried the old man, kissing her heartily. "Give us one, two, three, and a buster! Now away with our work, my dear, on with your holiday, and come along home with me. And me to stay. Do you hear? You are come to stay! There shall be no more this; I have made up my mind to 'liberty or death.'"

"But father—," began Mary Ann. "Don't, don't, don't stop to talk," interrupted the excited old man. "Get ready to shut up the house (we'll see to these clocks of furniture afterward), and come along home with me. And while you are tting fixed, Ross and I will go down wn and see what we can find."

"What in the world is going on?" said rs. John that night, as, weary and cross, ey drove up to the farmyard gate. "Has andad gone completely crazy, is the use afire, or what? Let me out, quick, hn; I'll read him the law, the old fool." Well might she exclaim and wonder. e house was brilliantly illuminated from p to bottom; flags streamed from ridge-le and windows and fluttered in splen-r from the balconies; rockets were ooting toward the sky, pin wheels and oman candles buzzing and sputtering in hundred different colors, cannon crack-s bursting, and a happy, boyish voice outing, with an old man's tender tones ingled joyfully therewith.

Mrs. John strode forward aflame with ssion. "I want to know what this means?" she shrieked rather than said. "A pretty thing it is if we can't go away for the day without having the house turned upside down. Have you taken leave of your senses, old man Pettingill?"

Grandfather, sitting on the lawn in his old armchair, surveyed her quietly. The hour had come to strike the decisive blow, and though weak and tremulous for the moment, he spoke up grandly, for Mary Ann and the boy were both beside him.

"What does it mean, Mrs. John Pettingill, ma'am? It means the declaration of my independence. It means that I have taken full possession of my own home and affairs, and that I have brought my daughter and her boy here to live with me and help me take care of things."

"You have taken possession! You have brought Mary Ann! What right have you to say or do anything, I should like to know?"

"If you insist upon it, I will take you to the court-house to-morrow and give you an insight into my rights," replied the old man firmly. Then, seeing that she was cowed, he went on gently:

"Let us settle this without any more words, Margaret. John and you have almost ruined me, but I am willing to let bygones be bygones, if you will consent to be reasonable. I do not want people to know there has been trouble between us; allow them to think that you are tired of farming and mean to return to the city; it will appear natural enough that my widowed daughter should keep house for me, and I will help John into something he has more ability for than farming. I should like you to go as soon and as quietly as possible. Now, Ross, this is the last rocket, son. Let it go, and then three cheers for Old Glory and Independence Day!"

The rocket soared upward and broke into a blaze of brilliant stars, the cheer was given heartily, and Grandfather Pettingill's independence was re-established forever.

Seventeen Outgoing Missionaries

ECENTLY an interesting Conference was held in Cincinnati, between the seventeen outgoing missionaries and the officers the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, under whose auspices they will begin work very soon. Of the seventeen, eight are returning to their fields after rest on furlough; nine will go out for the first time.

This company, as all similar ones, was composed of rare men and women, because of their strength and devotion. Strong in faith, strong in intellectual endowments and equipments, strong in high and holy purposes. One of the characteristics of the gathering was the abounding joy of the missionaries; they are glad in the Lord, and joyful in the anticipations of entering into his service in foreign fields. The joy of the experienced missionaries, too, was just as great as that of those only preparing to go the first time. Nothing was said about "sacrifices" which the missionaries would make; but all were as cheerful and happy as you might expect had they been starting out as ambassadors to some proud earthly court, under princely salaries. One of the most joyful sessions was that, in which twenty-five missionaries and their friends sat down to a long, well-stocked dining-table, in the home of Secretary F. M. Ains, to commune in social fellowship.

The following missionaries at home on furlough, attended this Conference: Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Bentley, of Shanghai, China; Mr. and Mrs. Frank Garrett, of Nankin, China; Miss Bertha Clauson, of Osaka, Japan; G. L. Wharton, of Jabalpur, India, and Mr. and Mrs. Layton, of Bolengi, Africa (who will be transferred to China). The newly-appointed missionaries in attendance were: Mr. C. S. Settlemyer, Mr. D. E. Dannenberg, Mr. Justin E. Brown, Miss Meacham and Miss Nancy Cockrell, who go to China; Mr. D. McCoy, Mr. W. H. Erskine, and Miss Virginia Stewart, who go to Japan; and C. Bulehr, who goes to India. All these, both old and new, go to their fields of labor in September.

The Violet

VIOLET, sweet violet,
Thy shy blue eyes are wet, are wet
With the tear-drops of the night
And thy heartfelt griefs; but yet
God doth give the morning light,
And his shining clear and bright,
God cares for thee, violet.

Violet, blue violet,
With a sweeter fragrance yet,
Thou shalt rise with added grace
(For thy heart with God has met),
All his tenderness to trace
Mid the comforts of his face;
God still loves thee, violet.

Violet, dear violet,
All thy griefs wilt thou forget,
In a sweet and glad surprise;
God will shine in beauty yet,
Through the dewdrops in thine eyes,
Like the rainbow in the skies,
Till thy face no more is wet.

Universal Peace

WAR, glorify its heroes as we will, is in its essence a disgraceful thing. It is necessary at times, but it is always deplorable. So long as we have to do with nations who cannot understand any argument but force, and who will not behave themselves, until compelled to do so, there must be wars. As in private life we do not argue with a drunken man and do not plead with a man infuriated with passion, but use force to subdue him, so there are some nations who will remove their neighbors' landmarks, or get up a quarrel in order to rob a neighbor of territory, and with these, there is no remedy but to fight. The most peaceable man in the world would be justified in knocking down a man who was rushing, axe in hand, into a crowded schoolhouse, intent on committing murder. We applaud the captain of a ship who, in a disaster, takes his revolver and threatens to shoot men who persist in filling the boats, to the exclusion of women and children. So there are times, as in the India Mutiny, when for the preservation of life, it is necessary to take life. But the necessity is always a matter of regret and reluctance.

In former times, when a noble charged another noble with treachery, or any other disgraceful thing, or when one man insulted another, it was the usual course to arrange a duel. The duel never vindicated a man, nor proved his guilt; it simply showed which of the two was the stronger or the better skilled in the use of weapons. We have realized that fact, and now we expect men who have quarrelled to take their case into court, and there let the question in dispute be decided by judge and jury. In theory, though not always in practice, the question is then settled according to its rights, and, in any case, it is a more sensible and logical way of dealing with it. But among nations recourse is still had to the antiquated and absurd method of the duel, which can never decide which nation is in the right; but only which nation has the better armies, generals and military equipment, which is not the question in dispute.

The example set by the United States and Great Britain, in the Alabama controversy, has been extensively followed since that time, and many disputes which, a century ago would have involved war, have been settled by arbitration. Many other disputes which have been settled by war, might have been arbitrated to the advantage of both Powers. Eventually, it may be hoped, the fact will be realized by statesmen, and war will become the exception instead of the rule. The advantage is so obvious, that one wonders that arbitration should not always be sought. The fearful loss of both life and treasure which war involves, is seldom compensated by the results of victory.

The difficulty at present, is that there is not sufficient confidence in the wisdom and impartiality of the tribunal to which disputes may be submitted. It is assumed that the representatives on that tribunal of the parties to the dispute, will decide according to their nationality, and that the other judges will be swayed by political and friendly relations with these Powers, rather than by the merits of the particular case to be submitted. Isaiah's conception (2:2-4), contemplates the removal of this difficulty. He sees the Messiah reigning in Jerusalem, and all the Powers of the earth taking to him their quarrels for adjudication. When that time comes, the prospect of the world at peace is conceivable. There would be perfect confidence in the righteousness of Christ's decision, and even when he rebukes many people, as the prophet says he will, his rebuke will be received humbly and meekly.

It shows how much nearer the world is coming to the spirit of Christ, that arbitration, even with our imperfect machinery, is being adopted in so many instances. The world is thus being prepared for the rule of Christ. When He comes, whose right it is to reign, the Golden Age so long dreamed of by poets and philosophers will dawn, and this world, weary of centuries of conflict and struggle, will at last be at peace.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man whose spine was curved for thirty years. By the use of this invention his spine was straightened. It is nature's own method. It has never yet failed. The old methods of torture are doomed forever. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the marvelous results. Physicians in hospitals and in private practice are endorsing it. The new discovery relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the spinal cord is invigorated and strengthened, the cartilage between the vertebrae expands and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for all, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every state in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for free booklet giving full information and list of references.

TWO STEPS

The Last One Helps the First

A sick coffee drinker must take two steps to be rid of his troubles and get strong and well again. The first is to cut off coffee absolutely. That removes the destroying element. The next step is to take liquid food (and this is Postum Food Coffee) that has in its elements nature requires to change the blood corpuscles from pale pink or white to rich red, and good red blood buds good, strong, and healthy cells in place of the broken down cells destroyed by coffee. With well boiled Postum Food Coffee to shift to, both these steps are easy and pleasant. The experience of a Georgian proves how important both are.

From 1872 to the year 1900 my wife and I had both been afflicted with sick or nervous headache, and at times we suffered untold agony. We were coffee drinkers and did not know how to get away from it, for the habit is hard to quit.

But in 1900 I read of a case similar to ours where Postum Coffee was used in place of the old coffee, and a complete recovery resulted, so I concluded to get some and try it.

The result was, after three days use of Postum in place of the coffee, I never had a symptom of the old trouble, and in five months I had gained from 145 pounds to 163 pounds.

My friends asked me almost daily what wrought the change. My answer always is, leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place.

We have many friends who have been benefited by Postum.

As to whether or not I have stated the facts truthfully, I refer you to the Bank of Carrollton or any business firm in that city, where I have lived for many years, and am well known. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason. Look in each pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

TRUST AND FAILURE

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN once we are one with God about anything, he cannot but prevail; we fight no more, he does it all. It was so in the life of King Asa, of Judah, when the Ethiopians came against him (II. Chron. 14: 11-15). The enemies fled; Judah pursued, and "the Ethiopians were overthrown, that they could not recover themselves, for they were destroyed before the Lord and before his host." And the result was not only victory, not only much spoil, but also that "the fear of the Lord came upon the cities round about Gerars, and they spoiled the cities." And still more: there came a message from God by the mouth of the prophet Oded, to the king and to his people: "The Lord is with you while ye be with him; and if you seek him, he will be found of you." This victory is not an exception; it will be continuous victory if God finds in you continuous faith and obedience; but if ye forsake him, he will also forsake you. And then, after referring to the times of the Judges, and God's deliverances when his people sought unto him, the prophet concludes: "Be ye strong, therefore, and let not your hands be weak, and your work shall be rewarded."

This was more to the godly king than the victory. To know that God would speak to him and encourage him was life to a man of God. "If God be for us, who shall be against us." So Asa was stirred up to cleanse the land thoroughly of all that remained of idolatry. And his heart yearned for the people of Israel. And he renewed the altar of the Lord, and gathered not only his own people, but also the strangers out of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Simeon; for they fell to him out of Israel in abundance when they saw that the Lord his God was with him. And then took place the first of four revivals in Judah. Asa was not satisfied that the people should meet together to celebrate a feast to the Lord; he called on them to make a most solemn covenant "to seek the Lord their God."

So great was the enthusiasm that they swore unto the Lord with a loud voice, and with shouting and with trumpets and with cornets. There was no fear of what the idolaters would say or of what they should suffer when they reached home. "All Judah rejoiced at the oath; for they had sworn with all their heart, and sought him with their whole desire, and he was found of them, and the Lord gave them rest round about." It was easy to serve God at such a time; the fashion had changed. But if Asa had not stood out boldly on the Lord's side, alone but for Oded, it would have been difficult indeed for the people to make a stand. There must ever be one who will serve God at any cost, whose faithfulness breaks the way, and then followers are easily found. If the first in a family who is converted is true to God, there is hope for the rest; but if the first has only half come out from the world, there is little hope for the rest.

And now the Lord Jehovah who can send war or stay war as he wills, kept this little nation in peace for nearly twenty-five years. How was it that God did not allow the peace to last until Asa was dead? The education of his children is precious to the Lord, and there were lessons for Asa yet to learn. In the thirty-sixth year of his reign, Baasha, the reigning king of Israel came up against Judah, and built Ramah, to prevent any of his people coming to Asa, as some had done (II. Chron. 15: 8-9). No doubt there was something of religious persecution in this move, as well as political jealousy. What should Asa do? Would he not trust, who had been so delivered by God in the past? Alas! he failed just in that which most touches God. Instead of going straight to God, he goes back to human resources, and seeks the help of idolatrous Syria against God's people Israel.

If God had delivered Asa and his people from the heathen Ethiopians, how much more would he have settled the differences of his own people if they had trusted him! But, oh, what a lesson it is to us! Asa's past grace was not equal to a new emergency; we need for each test grace especially for that test, and herein this man of God failed.

Greater Atlantic City

FIFTY years ago Absecon Island was a stretch of surf-washed sand on the Jersey Coast. To-day the same island is celebrating its Golden Anniversary as the greatest watering resort on the globe, the Mecca of millions of tourists seeking health and pleasure. Its wind-blown dunes have become the site of beautiful Atlantic City, with its permanent population of 35,000, and an estimated summer population of 250,000.

Busy streets, handsome cottages, palatial hotels cover the Island from shore to shore, from the Inlet to Longport, making it necessary for Atlantic City to seek a new direction in which to expand.

Wonderful Growth

Little did Jeremiah Leeds think, when paying forty cents an acre for Absecon Beach, little did his family think when selling it for $17.50 an acre, that to-day a moderate valuation of the real estate within Atlantic City's limits would total $70,000,000. Yet such is the fact.

This wondrous growth is due apparently, not to booming or speculation, but to entirely natural causes which exercise a peculiar fascination over visitors. So long as her beach is the finest, her surf the coolest, her skies the brightest, her breezes the balmiest, her boardwalk the gayest, access to her glories the easiest, so long must Atlantic City hold her sway, and so long will sweltering inland millions crowd her healthful shores. With this combination of excellences, the growth and prosperity of Atlantic City are practically as certain as the rising and setting of the sun.

Within ten years land in the heart of Atlantic City has risen 800 per cent., and Atlantic City is yet in its infancy. Unlike some shore resorts, as Newport, which was made by millionaires, Atlantic City has made comfortable fortunes for almost everybody who has invested in her real estate. The next ten years, in the judgment of those who know best, is bound to see as great a rise in the city's suburban property.

City Must Expand

A glance at the map bears out this opinion. There rests Atlantic City on Absecon Island as on a throne—beautiful Queen City of the Coast, but with no room for expansion. Land is just as scarce about her as water is plenty. The salt marshes, five miles in width, stretch toward the mainland, affording no outlet for growth. To build on these, is to build on mud washed by tide-water.

But Atlantic City must expand; homes must be built somewhere. There is but one direction—on the highland at Pleasantville Terrace, adjoining the town of Pleasantville. In this direction is absolutely all the natural highground unoccupied within seven miles of the city. Accordingly attention is now being turned to this section.

The Story of How the Popular Watering Resort is Making Poor Men Rich and Rich Men Richer

This large tract of highland, formerly known as the Doughty Estate, belonged to General Doughty, of Revolutionary fame, whose log cabin still stands, a relic of that stirring period. This estate has remained in the Doughty family until this spring, when they sold it, thus allowing it to be placed on the market for the first time in over a hundred years.

On the Highland

Situated sixty feet above, and overlooking the ocean, Pleasantville Terrace affords the only natural outlet for the growth of Atlantic City, and promises an opportunity to investors not unlike that which made the wealth of the early owners of property on the Island.

Here the tonic air of the pine mingles with the healing ocean breezes, making it a natural resort of persons seeking restoration to health. Here also a beautiful natural lake, one mile in length, provides boating, fishing, swimming. The woods of pine and oak afford good hunting in season, and artesian wells furnish the purest water.

Easy of Access

Access is easy, the handsome new station being just twelve minutes ride on the Reading Railroad from the famous Boardwalk. All trains, except through express, make regular stops. A trolley line runs from Pleasantville, tickets being sold at the rate of six for twenty-five cents. The Delaware and Atlantic City Trolley line is surveyed directly through the property, and the Washington Avenue trolley will pass nearby.

The Atlantic City Estate Company, who are the purchasers of this property, have divided it into lots, 25 by 100 feet, which they are offering to investors and home-builders at prices that will seem insignificant five years hence. Since this is all the unoccupied land there is within seven miles, such an opportunity to secure a home-site suburban to the world's greatest shore resort is not likely to occur again.

The price of these lots is $25; but for a short time only $10 will be deducted from the price of every other lot. Corner lots command $5 extra, a few choice lots being valued at $35.

It should be remembered that this is within easy reach of the wonderful Boardwalk, twelve minutes ride by rail, and a five cent fare by trolley.

These lots may be had on the following remarkably easy terms: $1 down, each lot; $1 weekly for 1 or 2 lots; $2 weekly for 3 to 5 lots. No charge for deed; no mortgages; no interest; no taxes until 1906.

It can be readily seen that a fortune is not required to own a valuable piece of real estate. One may become an investor or a home-builder on a very small capital. Here a family may live inexpensively, amid quiet shade and cooling breezes, within a few minutes ride of the world's greatest Ocean Sanatorium.

Safety of Investment

So sure is the Company of the goodness of the investment, that it gives a black and white guarantee that the lots will increase in value at least 25 per cent. within one year, or money will be refunded with six per cent. interest. Titles are guaranteed by Integrity Title Trust Company, of Philadelphia. Should the owner of property in Pleasantville Terrace die before the lots are fully paid for, his heirs will receive a clear title, thus insuring him against risk or loss. Should he desire to build before September 1st, half the purchase price will be returned, and every assistance given in his enterprise.

In this way men of moderate means may invest on the easiest terms and under the safest guarantee, with practically no risk. It is certainly a most unusual position. Land is the safest form of investment. It cannot burn, be stolen or affected by financial panic. Pleasantville Terrace is the only land convenient to Atlantic City which can be bought as easily as on such terms.

Franklin P. Stoy, Mayor of Atlantic City, was among the first to recognize the advantages of Pleasantville Terrace, and among the first to purchase. He has consented to reply to all inquiries as to the standing of the company and the goodness of the investment. Prominent officials of the Reading Railroad, clergymen and hundreds of business men have also purchased largely. Property is sold under wise permanent restrictions, and to white people only.

Every facility is offered for investigation. Regular weekly excursions are run from Atlantic City, leaving the Reading Station at 2.30 P.M. Agents furnish tickets at the station, or they may be had at the Company's Offices, 410 Bailett Building, Atlantic City.

A New Section

To those who cannot visit the property in person, a booklet and plans, from which to make selection, will be sent upon request. Section B just opened.

By enclosing $1 with name and address as many lots may be secured as desired up to five, which is all that can be sold to one person. Satisfaction is guaranteed on one dollar will be returned. Or, send name and address for booklet and further information to The Atlantic City Estate Company, Victor J. Humbrecht, President. Philadelphia office, 1039-1050 Drexel Building, Fifth and Chestnut. Atlantic City Office, 410 Bartlett Building; or, 1615 Boardwalk, between Kentucky and Illinois streets; Camden, N. J., Office, 304 Market Street; Newark, N. J., Office, 412 Prudential Building; Washington, D. C., 209 Jefferson Building.

Questions & Answers

R. F. D., Pittsfield, Mass. 1. Is there any place in the Bible that tells how much Judas sold Jesus for? 2. What does Matt. 23:9 mean?

1. See Zech. 11:12 and Matt. 27:6-9. 2. The words must be taken in connection with what precedes and follows them. Christ was warning men against "the itch for ecclesiastical superiority," and the vain-glory of high-sounding church titles. He wished them to remember that the Rabbi, Guide, Teacher, Master, Father—over and above all others—is God, to whom alone the love and homage of the spirit belong, and that in his sight all his children are equal.

R. F., Lexington, Ky. Was the plot of The Merchant of Venice original with Shakespeare, or if not, where did he get it?

He is believed to have been indebted for that part of the story which deals with the bond and the caskets to the Gesta Romanorum, a Latin collection of stories, published in the time of Henry VI., or possibly to a tale by Giovanni Fiorentino, published in Milan in 1558, but written nearly 200 years earlier. Some of the speeches were apparently suggested by a piece called The Orator, by Alexandre Silvayn (1596.) Other sources have also been recognized. Shakespeare adapted from many sources, and illuminated all with the light of his own transcendent genius.

Subscriber, New York. Is there anything in Scripture to forbid cremation? Is there anything to recommend it?

There are only two instances of cremation mentioned in Scripture, viz.: The case of Saul and his sons (I. Sam. 31:12), and that referred to in Amos 6:10. The latter appears to have reference to a season of pestilence, when burning the bodies was considered advisable in order to check the spread of the plague. The ancient Romans apparently favored incineration, but the Jews from time immemorial observed the practice of burial. Cremation does not seem to have been considered, consequently there is nothing found in the sacred writings specially dealing with the subject.

Anna H. L., Sellersburg, Ind. What is the Bible meaning of "saint," and also "Christian?" Have the two words a different meaning?

"Saint" means simply "a holy one," or "one of a consecrated life." Before the Christian era, it was applied to those who were eminent for piety and virtue, and whose lives showed them to be consecrated or sanctified persons. Thus the ancient Jews had their saints, one of the most celebrated being Judah Hak-kadosh (Rabbi Judah, the Holy), the author of the Mishna. In the New Testament, the "saints" were those Christians who were set apart by consecration or dedicated to God's service. Later, the martyrs and apostles became the recognized saints of the Christian church throughout the world.

Cheerfulness is a virtue—a greater one than most people imagine. An aged reader (Mrs. Mary E. B., of Castle, N. Y., aged seventy-seven), writes:

Here is some of my own rhyming:
What's the use, as the years go by,
To snivel up, grow old and cry.
Smooth the wrinkles! Hold up the head,
Until you are laid out for dead.

Good, simple, wholesome philosophy, which takes trouble lightly and goes bravely forward, confident in God's love and care.

A. B., Corning, Ia. 1. What do you understand by a person being self-righteous? 2. Is it best for parents to insist on the family attending church regularly, when there are difficulties and inconvenience in so doing?

1. A self-righteous person is one who is proud of his spiritual attainments, who trusts to his own merits rather than to God's grace, who is censorious of his brethren and holds himself superior to them. 2. Parents do well to put aside obstacles in order to attend church. The children should acquire the habit and should see how much importance the parents attach to the duty. No trivial inconvenience should be allowed to keep them at home. There are cases, however, in which this may be carried to an extreme. We can imagine a case of a child being sick and a mother feeling it more her duty to be at the child's bedside than at church, and she would be wise and justified in attending to her child rather than going to church. A man might be serving God better in helping to put out a fire in a neighbor's house than in being present in his usual place in his pew.

We Want 1,000,000 Names

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is planning to send out next Fall, one million invitations to Christian families likely to subscribe. To accomplish this, we require the assistance of our present subscribers. They know what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is, and they also know whether its introduction into new homes should be encouraged. We leave, without misgivings, the decision in their hands.

We want the names of one million adult, Protestant Church members, no two living in the same house, and we invite our subscribers to co-operate in the work of supplying these names. We ask each subscriber to send us the names of exactly twenty-five persons, no more, no less—all names to be written on one side of one large sheet—giving, First, Designation, Mr., Mrs., Dr., Prof. Second, Christian name. Third, Surname. Fourth, Street address (except in very small towns). Fifth, Town. Sixth, County. Seventh, State. Eighth, What denomination. As, for instance: Dr. John Smith, 42 Terrace Avenue, Jeffersonville, Cook County, Ohio, Methodist.

While many of our subscribers, we are sure, would be glad to supply twenty-five names without any financial consideration, we feel that such kind co-operation should be recognized, and therefore we submit the following proposition, which we are quite sure will be found unusually liberal and attractive:

THIS IS OUR PROPOSITION

Send us Twenty-five names—no more, no less—conforming to the requirements mentioned above; namely, adult, Protestant Church members, no two living in the same house, and send fifteen cents in coin, or stamps, and we will have your own name placed on the subscription list of the Twentieth Century Home, the greatest monthly home magazine published, for a term of six months, beginning with the July number, on the following basis:

Twentieth Century Home, Regular Price for Six Months, 50 cents
Allowance for Twenty-Five Names { twenty-five cents } 35 cents
Allowance for Paper, Postage, etc. { ten cents }
Cash to be Remitted with Names - - - 15 cents

☛ If you prefer, we will substitute Pearson's Magazine for the Twentieth Century Home.

★ ★ ★ ★

By special arrangement with Mr. John Brisben Walker, Proprietor of the Twentieth Century Home, and with the Publishers of Pearson's Magazine, subscriptions sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under the above proposition, will share all the advantages enjoyed by other subscribers.

And finally, do not forget that no list mailed after July 31 will be accepted.

IMPORTANT.—We will supply for the above purpose FREE, specially ruled paper with liberal spaces for twenty-five names. Order by POSTAL CARD ONLY, and address as below.

NOW TO SUMMARIZE

FIRST—We want one million names.

SECOND—We will not accept any name from others than our subscribers.

THIRD—No person should send either more or less than twenty-five names.

FOURTH—The names must be written on one side of one sheet.

FIFTH—The list must be signed by the sender with his full address.

SIXTH—All names must be those of adult Protestant Church members, no two living in the same house.

SEVENTH—Every separate name should contain the title, Christian name, surname, street address, town, county, state, and denomination.

EIGHTH—If you accompany the list by fifteen cents, either in coin or stamps, we will send to you for six months, from July to December, either the Twentieth Century Home or Pearson's Magazine. Whatever selection you may make, your subscription will include the Thanksgiving and the Christmas editions of the paper of your choice.

NINTH—You may designate your preference for the one or the other of these two Magazines, but in case our arrangement with the publisher of the one you select should become exhausted before your list is received, we reserve the right to substitute the other Magazine mentioned in this article.

TENTH—The list must be posted not later than July 31.

The Christian Herald Circular Department
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Reader, Paterson, N. J. Why God permits pain, and sorrow, and suffering in the world, are not problems for man's solution. We can, however, accept them with Christian philosophy, as a part of that training which becomes "perfect through suffering." In a beautiful poem, Miss Learned gives this answer to the cry of the anguished to God to take away pain:

Then answered the Lord to the cry of his world:

"Shall I take away pain,

And with it the power of the world to endure,

Made strong by the strain?

Shall I take away pity that knits heart to heart

And sacrifice high?

Will ye lose all your heroes that lit from the fire

White brows to the sky?

Shall I take away love that redeems with a price

And smiles at its loss?

Can ye spare from your lives that would climb unto mine

The Christ on the Cross?"

There is a whole sermon of consolation and spiritual satisfaction in that verse.

H. E. O'D., Watervliet, N. Y. 1. What is the result of the Slocum disaster inquiry? Has

B. M. C., Mt. Vernon, Ia. What are the idle words condemned in Matt. 12:36?

The word idle, in the passage, covers a wide field. It includes not only profanity falsehood and abuse, but silly and frivolous talking. It does not apply to the cheerful humor and wit by which a man tries to raise the spirits of his friends, but to mere jesting especially on sacred subjects, by which a person who is disposed to serious thought may be diverted into merriment and idle laughter.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN KOREA

MISS SATO, A JAPANESE NURSE

They Gave the Bible to Korea

IN the year 1890 a Committee was appointed for the translation of the Scriptures into the Korean language, consisting of Rev. H. G. Underwood, Rev. W. B. Scranton, M.D., and Rev. H. G. Appenzeller.

After some years of translation and missionary work, Scranton returned to the United States, and Rev. Appenzeller was drowned. The vacancies thus caused were filled by the appointment of Rev. J. S. Gale and Rev. W. B. Reynolds. Rev. G. Heber Jones was also connected with the Committee for a time, but is now visiting in the United States on a furlough. As a result of their joint work, the New Testament has been translated for the Koreans, and is now in a tentative form. In the picture are three members of the present Committee, with their native assistants.

In the progress of Christian work in Korea, the circulation of the Scriptures has had an important part. Wherever the missionaries have gone, they have seen and distributed the Word of God, and it has been blessed to the conversion of many precious souls.

One instance of this kind was that of a Korean broker named Chay-Cho-Si, who was formerly drunkard and profligate, but was led by the power of the truth to repent of his sins. He has been a noble witness for Christ. At one time he endured great opposition and severe persecution; but he triumphed over it, and some who had opposed him most were led through his example to repentance and a new life.

In all lands, and under all circumstances, the Word of God is the one firm basis for the renovation of mankind. Other systems of religion may give some elements of good, but none can so transform the lives of men as the Gospel of Christ. The production, therefore, of any new version gives reason for joy and gratitude. More than food to the hungry, it is the word of life to souls perishing in sin.

During the war with China there were more than a dozen Christian nurses who did excellent service in the Japanese military hospitals, and won for themselves much gratitude and praise. Among them was a Miss Sato, who had graduated at a Christian school in Tokio. She was a very earnest Christian. She was afterwards sent for to attend the Japanese Crown Prince during a severe sickness, and her faithfulness and skill were greatly appreciated.

Some time ago, Dr. Avison, of the Presbyterian Hospital in Seoul, Korea, sent to Japan for a Christian nurse, and Miss Sato volunteered to go to his assistance.

On a recent visit to Korea, I was shown through the Hospital, and there saw her dressing the wounds of a poor soldier who had been nearly killed by the accidental explosion of a cannon. Her self-possession and there has been no anxiety there, and no interruption to mission work on account of the war. People are busy with their farming and trading. In May last, the spiritual ingathering at Fusan was the largest ever known. Thirty-one being baptized, and fifty-one admitted as catechumens.

"A Christian wedding has attracted much attention by its results. A bridegroom of seventeen and a bride of fifteen were united, being the first couple in all our work who had started together, both being church members. They knew nothing of each other, had no courtship, no happy days together to lead them to the altar, for they saw each other for the first time when they came to the ceremony. The parents had made all arrangements and only decided the wedding should take place three days before it occurred. A strange way of doing things, it is true, but thoroughly Korean! After marriage, the young people fell in love, a rare thing in this land and slower than it is rare, and this has made a remarkable impression on the Christians near their home, while to the heathen it is inexplicable.

"Should Russia win in this conflict, it is likely Korea would go to her as a prize; and we all know how intolerant she is of other branches of the Christian Church. Our work might not all be swallowed up, yet certain it is we should be unable to keep up as aggressive a campaign as now among this peculiarly receptive people. Should Japan win, we have no fears on the line of missionary work. Whether Korea remained independent, became a dependency of Japan, or was entirely taken over by the Japanese, we expect the preaching of the Cross in our own way would not be molested, but would be protected, even if we were not helped.

The missionaries in Korea, to a man, I believe, are therefore hoping and sometimes praying for the victory of the heathen over the Christian, for we believe the heathen will prosper Christianity of a vital, forceful type more than the Christian nation.

The event is in His hands! We wait, and work while we wait, and we enjoy even now some of the rich fruits of our labors."

skill in a most trying case were truly wonderful. It was evident that the reputation and honors she had gained were well deserved.

And thus the blessings of Christianity are not only manifest in Japan, but are even transported to Korea, where there is so much of suffering and need.

Progress of Gospel Work in Korea

In a letter from Rev. R. H. Sidebotham, an American missionary at Fusan, Korea, the writer says

NATIONAL PROSPERITY

WHAT is national prosperity? There have been many views on that subject; it is important to know which view is right.

One view, and perhaps the earliest—the one commonest among rude peoples—was that a prosperous nation must be strong in war. It was the view of the old Spartans, who shaped everything in their public laws and domestic customs so as to secure the greatest possible military efficiency. The early Romans, of course, held a similar view. We must admit considerable truth in it, and that it encouraged some admirable virtues among the people, for the world will not forget that finest product of Spartan discipline, Leonidas and his three hundred at the Pass of Thermopylae.

And yet facts have often proved this view of national prosperity defective, and that it may become terribly demoralizing. If a nation grows very strong in war, and makes a business of war, until the business has to be conducted professionally, like any other great trade, the nation may find herself at last trusting to armies of foreign mercenaries, while her own people have lost heart for fighting, and so lose the only virtue they ever had. Every one knows how complete this demoralization became in the overgrown and decrepit Rome in the time of the later empire.

Not in Wealth

Another view, increasingly influential in our own times, is that a prosperous nation must be rich. Six or seven hundred years ago Venice rose to greatness under this theory; afterwards Spain and Portugal, when they had a chance to tap the wealth of the Golden Indies; and then Holland and England;—in fact all the great sea powers. And certainly there has been some truth in this view: those qualities of industry, economy and commercial integrity, which give the foundation for permanent wealth are very desirable qualities.

And yet the past has often proved that this view of national prosperity is defective, and may be terribly demoralizing. Some kinds of wealth have been so disastrous to a nation. Those tainted streams of gold, for instance, that used to pour into the treasury of Spain from her American Colonies. And, indeed, any very great wealth, after it is attained, has been found likely to sap and kill the very virtues which contributed to its attainment; the old-time frugal industry gives way to luxury and to crazy speculation, and then farewell to national greatness, and soon farewell to the wealth also.

Still another view of national prosperity would connect it with the possession of just laws and a well-framed system of government. A theory which was very firmly held by many earnest men in the eighteenth century. It was the ruling thought in the minds of the leaders of the French Revolution; and also of our American Revolution. And certainly there is a vast deal of truth in this view; and yet the world ought to have learned by this time that good laws are not identical with prosperity, and that by themselves they are not strong enough to create and secure prosperity. The French Revolution itself, with its reign of terror, will always start up like an apparition to warn us against trusting to this legislative scheme of national safety and welfare. The same lesson was taught long before in the sacred history of the Jews. A law furnished them by divine inspiration, and most admirably adapted to the condition of their people; yet that law could not save them. By the works of the law they could not be saved.

Not in Religious Institutions

Still another view of national prosperity would connect it with a suitable establishment of religion; a national church; some kind of national creed. And certainly you and I believe that this view was aimed toward a great truth; but as certainly it does not quite hit it; for almost all the dead and buried nations have had such a religious establishment at some time in their history. It did not save them. And to refer once more to the sacred example of the Jews, we have been taught that their religious establishment, like their law, was divinely furnished to them; and in the course of time they became proud of it, and passionately devoted to it; yet it could not save them. Its most strenuous advocates were those Scribes and Pharisees against whom our Lord pronounced his most terrible denunciations.

We might speak of other views of the subject; as, for instance, the old Athenian view that a prosperous nation must be a knowing nation: that enough schooling will solve the whole problem. But the later history of the Greek States was a sufficient refutation of any view they might hold on the subject; so, without more delay, I wish to call your thoughts back to the view advocated by the old Hebrew Prophets, and expressed in our text: "Thy people shall be all righteous." This is Isaiah's view of a prosperous nation. "All of them righteous." It bases the prosperity of a nation on the individual characters of the people.

*Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue, New York. Text: Isa. 60: 21. "Thy people also shall be all righteous."

Of course, with this foundation, other things will follow. If the people are righteous, they will do the right thing, whatever that may be. If ever the national duty should be war, a righteous people will do good fighting. In time of peace, you may expect them to display the industry, economy and honesty which result in increase of wealth. At all times you will expect such a people to devise reasonable forms of government and just laws. You will certainly expect them to appreciate and secure the advantages of education. Look at the 16th century Dutchmen founding their Leyden University. Look at the New England Puritans of the 17th century building their district schools and their Harvard College. A righteous people will love wisdom. Above all, a righteous people will believe in a righteous God, and give proper expression to their faith by right institutions of religion. So all those other elements of national prosperity that we spoke of will be regularly appearing among a righteous people.

It is a magnificent picture of visible material prosperity that Isaiah draws in the chapter from which our text was taken. The strongest poetic figures are used for declaring that the very things which men had always counted best worth having, shall come in large measure to this favored people of God. But the foundation fact—on which all else rests—is this. "Thy people shall be all righteous." The righteous characters of the several Israelites supply the foundation which will have to hold up the prosperity of Israel. You know Isaiah was not peculiar in this opinion. This was the one sermon of all the old Hebrew prophets; they might use a great variety of text and illustrations, but it was always for the preaching of this one sermon. And that is always a good sermon for any people: it is a good sermon for us Americans to hear and heed. For we have been so strongly tempted at times to accept one or another of those other defective, demoralizing views of national prosperity.

Modern Tendencies

That our nation must by all means be strong in war, for instance. I do not think this has been, generally, a besetting error with our people, but for the last few years there has seemed some danger that it should become so. If once we should enter into that kind of competition for the strongest fleets and armies, there will be some Americans who will think success in that success enough. Then, if any John Baptist should lift up his voice in warning against our national perils, these people would answer by pointing at these forts and battleships. Give us a very few ships more, they say, or a few more thousand soldiers, and our country will be safe. Welcome any Hebrew prophet, or other preacher, who could guard us against so disastrous a mistake as that.

And then the theory that wealth is true prosperity, that a nation rich enough is certainly well off, and nobody can doubt that this has been a besetting error with our people. The temptation is very strong this way, for we have been growing rich so fast, and there seems every reason to believe that for a while longer we shall go on growing rich so fast. And the color of gold, when there was enough of it, has always dazzled men, bewildered them. If a man knows that he could easily buy out his neighbor, it seems natural for him to think that he must be more of a man than his neighbor, worth more. It is easy for nations to fall into the same way of thinking, and if the time should ever come, as it seems likely to come, when our nation could easily buy out any other nation in the markets of the world, it would be easy for us to think that we are therefore the greatest and best and safest of people; yet for a long time, perhaps, this same easily gotten wealth had been robbing us of those old-fashioned virtues of industry and prudence which were the beginning of our wealth. We were growing luxurious and extravagant, and so while boasting of our riches, we were preparing for universal bankruptcy a little further on, when the yellow Chinaman, or some other frugal people, might move in and buy up what was left of our wasted inheritance.

And then there was some danger that we should trust in good laws to make us prosperous; some of us had inclined to that opinion. You know how Dickens and other foreign critics used to laugh at our America habit of boasting of our "institutions," as if good law would save. It would seem that our own past history had been enough to undeceive us on that point. America ought to know, by this time, that something more is needed than good laws to make a nation prosperous.

Righteousness the True Test

And yet some of us have not quite learned that lesson. Some still cherish the idea that a little more improvement of laws would save us. Get a law on the statute book against polygamy and divorce, and men will be pure; a law against gambling, and men will no longer risk their money on a bet; a more stringent prohibitory law, and men will no longer drink liquor. It is hard to keep the fact in mind, that even the best laws are only the expression of the will of the people; the law does not create the right will of the people, but the right will of the people must create the laws. The real foundation of national prosperity is back of these laws, back of the national constitution, back of our wealth, back of our army and navy. All those visible tokens of prosperity might be present in largest measure, while really our nation was on the brink of ruin, in the actual process of ruin. Righteousness: that is the foundation. How much of what God himself knows for righteousness is there in the hearts of the people?

There was once a good deal of it. It is no vanity to say so. As nations go, there was once a great deal of righteousness in American hearts. No other land was ever settled as this land was. Of course, they were not all saints, those early settlers, and the best of them were not altogether saintly. I have heard of those shiploads of convicts. I have heard of those great troops of younger sons and other adventurers, crowded out of their old home, who came over to try the fortunes here. But among those settlers there were also a goodly number who came for conscience sake. French Huguenots, Scotch Covenanters, Irish Presbyterians, English Puritans and Quakers. Men and women who had been well settled in their old home, who longed to stay there, and could have stayed there if only they would have renounced or concealed certain unfashionable religious convictions of theirs.

Founders of the Nation

I do not know how large a proportion these were of all the settlers; not very large probably, but these emigrants for conscience sake were of a sort to exert an influence out of all proportion to their number. Such men ought to be weighed, not numbered—these emigrants for conscience sake did very largely determine the tone and color of life in the American Colonies. They fastened the words of this Book in the minds of the people; they made the Lord's Day a very real American institution. They bred a race of public men able to take the lead, when the time came, in the great crisis of our war for national independence, and in the establishing of our government—the most extraordinary group of men in some ways that has ever appeared in any nation, not unsuitable companions for their leader Washington, whose lofty motive, and the simple disinterestedness of whose patriotism have lifted him to a unique position among the great men of history.

Yes, as compared with the nations generally, there was once a large degree of righteousness in the heart of our people, and time has shown that it was a good foundation on which to build any superstructure of national greatness that God might be designing for us.

But this kind of foundation has to be not dead but living. It cannot be laid once for all; as some of Pharaoh would lay the great stones of his Pyramid, stand from that time on while the world lasts. The stones in this temple must be living stones, "living stones," as the apostle calls them. The ancient virtue of the Pilgrim Fathers, or of our great Revolutionary leaders, can no more save America from her Twentieth Century enemies than the faith of Abraham could save Jerusalem from Titus and his Romans. If ever a time should come when this old-fashioned American righteousness shall have died out in the hearts of the American people, it will mean that the foundation stones have been drawn out from under the structure of our national prosperity; that the great house towering toward heaven stands only on a quicksand, and then the greater the house, the more terrible the fall.

I do not know how any thoughtful American can fail to grow anxious as he thinks of these things. Whenever existing sources of supply for some important commodity threaten to give out, we do grow anxious. I have learned that the lumber men are clearing away our great forests too fast; and that we are threatened with flood and drought and failure of timber, we do grow anxious; and we pass forestry laws and appoint forestry commissions to ward off the peril. If a city should learn that its water supply was being diverted or wasted so polluted so that the people might be left with no fit water for drinking, the citizens would grow anxious and adopt measures and cheerfully spend their money to ward off the peril. If there were danger that our coal fields should be exhausted in the near future, the source of supply of power for our ships and railroads and mills; you would see signs of the deepest anxiety among the people, as they bestirred themselves to ward off the peril.

But what if the previously existing sources of supply of righteousness in the hearts of the people should give out?

Take, for instance, the institution of the Lord's Day. I am not touching now the question of any divine command for keeping it, or any sin secularizing it, but simply the relation of cause and effect between the Lord's Day as our fathers observed it, and the degree of righteousness discoverable among them. The connection was very close. For one day in the week the secular work of these men stopped (and they had no newspapers to bring its details still before them), the public sentiment frowned upon most forms of amusement, so men were compelled to give their thoughts to something else, and the customs of the time made it natural and almost inevitable that many of them should give some thought to holy things. Those of us who remember a New England Sunday of thirty or forty years ago will know how a child in those days was almost compelled to face those great questions of right and wrong which lie at the basis of things.

Now, if this day is to be secularized, made like other days, can you tell me what other channel is going to convey these same serious thoughts and influences into a boy's heart? A child who has been encouraged to spend a large part of his Sunday traveling about the country, amusing himself, or reading sensational accounts of Saturday's amusements, what is going to supply to that child such elements of righteous character as used to come to his father when he would be still for a while on the first day of every week, and know that there is a righteous God, and that man's chief end must be to glorify and enjoy Him?
